After the two invocations of this great "we" come Goebbels's and Hitler's speeches about peace. The footage I have seen of Hitler's speeches, two generations on, shows a screeching, gesticulating man, his face contorting as he spits out his words to an audience that receives everything he says with huge enthusiasm. But those images are part of a course of events, containing a before and after, which show something else. I once saw one of Hitler's speeches in its entirety, it too began with Goebbels bellowing slogans, arms gesturing, eyes flashing, a warm-up man, and when finally he introduced Hitler the crowd erupted in exultation. Suddenly Hitler is there, utterly impassive on the stage. He mumbles some politeness into the microphone, ladies and gentlemen, perhaps, or dear countrymen, something like that. He seems ill at ease, as if he wishes he could be anywhere else but there. He fidgets uneasily with some papers on a table at his side, sips water from a glass, hitches up his trousers. He says nothing, but stares down before this enormous crowd whose attention is directed entirely toward him. His silence is almost unbearable, what can be wrong, has he lost his nerve? Is he really that nervous? Why is he not saying anything? He takes another sip of water. And then he leans forward toward the microphone. He speaks quietly, slowly, hesitantly. But everyone is listening, the silence is total, everyone wants him to succeed. I too wanted him to succeed. Even before he has spoken, he has established a very strong feeling of identification with himself on the part of his audience, the crowd is on his side, he is one of them. After that there is only one way, his speech rises and rises again in intensity, gripping each and every individual present, soon he has them all in the palm of his hand, they obey his every motion, he can say anything and they will never deny him but give him whatever he might ask them for. The important thing about Hitler's speeches was not what he said, the nature of the arguments he presented, but his winning over the crowd. The people were with him.

Albert Speer was twenty-eight years old when he saw Hitler for the first time, at Hasenheide, a beer hall in Berlin, where Hitler was to speak to the students of the university. In his autobiography Speer writes that he was expecting a caricature, a shrieking, gesticulating demagogue in uniform with a swastika armband. What he saw was something quite different. Hitler was dressed in a neat navy-blue suit, giving an impression of respectability, and when he started to talk he spoke softly and self-effacingly, Speer writes, and what he then witnessed was more like a talk on history than a political speech. Sober, self-conscious, respectable, these are the words Speer uses to describe Hitler. After a while the shyness and hesitancy vanished, his voice became more forceful, he stressed his words and spoke with great persuasion and more and more hypnotically, and this enthusiasm washed away all reservations, all skepticism, Hitler was no longer speaking to persuade and convince, yet nor did he seem to be saying what his audience expected of him. Speer writes that he had forgotten what Hitler had said only hours later, whereas the mood stayed with him, the passion and the optimism: he had seen the new, he had seen the future. All this was written in hindsight, and certainly with the aim of exonerating Speer himself, portraying him as someone who had been pulled along by something of considerable substance rather than by something lesser, thereby in a way being duped – at the same time there are many other sources that say exactly the same thing: there was something more to Hitler than the historical caricature.

Hitler himself knew he could never win over the people through argument alone. The written word was of no use to him, it led to nothing. What he wanted was palpable action, he strove for transformation, and transformation took place in the moment, among the people. An opinion in the newspaper, hitting out against this or that, prompting a response in kind, an endless debate washing this way and that, was meaningless, nothing but words. Even in his book, Mein Kampf, he returns time and again to his distrust of the written word. Mein Kampf is about how a society can be changed starting at the very bottom, and in that it is pragmatic rather than fanatical. At one point he writes:

> How hard it is to upset emotional prejudices, moods, sentiments, etc., and to replace them by others, on how many scarcely calculable influences and conditions success depends, the sensitive speaker can judge by the fact that even the > time of day in which the lecture takes place can have a decisive influence on the effect.

This is the goal: to work other thoughts in behind the protective wall formed by prejudice, which is to say general, unreflected opinions. That protective wall cannot be penetrated by argument, for it is not made of arguments. It is made of a sense of what is right and wrong, what is decent, what is appropriate. To reach behind it into where such opinions reside and may be changed, one must proceed via the emotions. This requires great attention to the audience, whose self-image must not be violated, what is said must not appear alien – in such cases it will be rejected – but familiar, as something already belonging to them, something that is them. Hitler writes:

> How hard it is to upset emotional prejudices, moods, sentiments, etc., and to replace them by others, on how many scarcely calculable influences and conditions success depends, the sensitive speaker can judge by the fact that even the time of day in which the lecture takes place can have a decisive influence on the effect. The same lecture, the same speaker, the same theme, have an entirely different effect at ten o'clock in the morning, at three o'clock in the afternoon, or at night. I myself as a beginner organized meetings for the morning, and especially remember a rally which we held in the Munich Kindl Keller as a protest "against the oppression of German territories." At that time it was Munich's largest hall and it seemed a very great venture. In order to make attendance particularly easy for the adherents of the movement and all the others who came, I set the meeting for a Sunday morning at ten o'clock. The result was depressing, yet at the same time extremely instructive: the hall was full, the impression really overpowering, but the mood ice cold; no one became warm, and I myself as a speaker felt profoundly unhappy at being unable to create any bond, not even the slightest contact, between myself and my audience. I thought I had not spoken worse than usual; but the effect seemed to be practically nil. Utterly dissatisfied, though richer by one experience, I left the meeting. Tests of the same sort that I later undertook led to the same result.

> This should surprise no one. Go to a theater performance and witness a play at three o'clock in the afternoon and the same play with the same actors at eight at night, and you will be amazed at the difference in effect and impression. A man with fine feelings and the power to achieve clarity with regard to this mood will be able to establish at once that the impression made by the performance at three in the afternoon is not as great as that made in the evening. The same applies even to a movie. This is important because in the theater it might be said that perhaps the actor does not take as much pain in the afternoon as at night. But a film is no different in the afternoon than at nine in the evening. No, the time itself exerts a definite effect, just as the hall does on me. There are halls which leave people cold for reasons that are hard to discern, but which somehow oppose the most violent resistance to any creation of mood. Traditional memories and ideas that are present in a man can also decisively determine an impression. Thus, a performance of Parsifal in Bayreuth will always have a different effect than anywhere else in the world. The mysterious magic of the house on the Festspielhügel in the old city of the margraves cannot be replaced or even compensated for by externals.

Mein Kampf was published in 1925, after Growth of the Soil, The People of Juvik, Kristin Lavransdatter, Ulysses, and the first volumes of In Search of Lost Time, but before The Castle, Being and Time, and The Sound and the Fury. It is the most infamous book of our time, not because of what it says in itself, but because what it says was carried out in real life, and it is impossible to read Mein Kampf today without immense distaste, for something terrible and repulsive is attached to it, as if it were written by the devil himself. But at the time of its writing, its author, Adolf Hitler, was an ordinary man, he had not murdered anyone, had ordered no killings to be carried out, had stolen nothing and burned nothing to the ground. Had he not risen to power in Germany nine years later, nothing of what he wrote would have had any particular significance or overtone, the book would presumably be long since forgotten, existing only in a limited number of dusty volumes on the shelves of university libraries, borrowed on rare occasion by a doctoral student writing about the historical period and finding the work illustrative of some of its typical characteristics, not least the paranoid hatred of Jews. But Hitler did rise to power in 1933, and Mein Kampf now occupies a place apart in literature, wide open to the world: not only were the words on its pages transformed into real life, but what happened there, in real life, stains its each and every word; not a sentence can be read or quoted without thinking about the Nazis' industrial extermination of the Jews and the millions who perished in World War II. It is almost impossible to read the book for what it once was, the work of a political fanatic outlining his personal background, analyzing society,and detailing what needs to be done in order to change it in the direction he wants. There is nothing gripping about it, nothing hypnotic or suggestive, and what little it says about its author and his life mutates into lengthy political ventings after barely a few lines. It has a smug, opinionated quality about it, for regardless of what aspect of society its author touches upon there is always something wrong with it, and moreover he knows exactly what it is and what needs to be done in order to put it right. Even the lambasting to which he often resorts gradually becomes rather mechanical. Mein Kampf is written in a tone of righteous indignation so powerful it must surely scare away anyone whose indignation by comparison falls short.

That the book takes the form of a bildungsroman, in which we follow the author from birth, through the first character-shaping years of childhood, and further into youth and the discoveries and fundamental insights of the young adult, has to do with the same thing: Hitler makes himself one with his politics, makes himself one with his role; what he believes and what he is are inseparable. Hitler builds up a persona in Mein Kampf, and that persona is his political platform. He is of the people, this is his message, and he knows the people's problems, having experienced them himself; gradually he devises a comprehensive political solution, a vision thereby bound up with both the people and his own person, concentrated in the name, the signum of the work, Adolf Hitler.

Invariably, the personal experiences he describes are hooked up to the political, and if the book has any biographical axis at all, it is considered from such a remote distance that everything personal and private, relating only to him, to his own person and character, the idiosyncratic, vanishes from sight. These are the book's first sentences:

> Today it seems to me providential that Fate should have chosen Braunau on the Inn as my birthplace. For this little town lies on the boundary between two German states which we of the younger generation at least have made it our life work to reunite by every means at our disposal.
> German Austria must return to the great German mother country, and not because of any economic considerations. No, and again no: even if such a union were unimportant from an economic point of view; yes, even if it were harmful, it must nevertheless take place. One blood demands one Reich. Never will the German nation possess the moral right to engage in colonial politics until, at least, it embraces its own sons within a single state. Only when the Reich borders include the very last German, but can no longer guarantee his daily bread, will the moral right to acquire foreign soil arise from the distress of our own people. Their sword will become our plow, and from the tears of war the daily bread of future generations will grow. And so this little city on the border seems to me the symbol of a great mission.

Like any other memoir or autobiography, Mein Kampf begins with the main character's birth. But no sooner are we informed of it than this "I" recedes into a "we," so essential that the first thing it does there is to define its borders.

"We" is the people, and the people's we stands above the we of the state by which it has been divided. The necessity of the we becoming united again stands above practical everyday politics and has its foundations in morality, finding its force in the body, that which is outside of language, nonargumentative, tangible, and physical: the blood. So essential is this that reunification takes precedence over the damage it will entail. Once this, the book's utopia, has been accomplished, the practical consequences of it, the damage done, the country being unable to feed its people, will be rectified by way of the moral mandate that comes with being a united people, which is to say the conquering of new land. In less than half a page then, Hitler has both outlined his political program and associated it with his own person, born in Braunau on the Inn, a border town and thereby symbolic of this great task, the reunification of the two countries' peoples into one, which he, child of the borderland, will carry out. This goal stands above everything else, and such is the symbolic and moral power of the reunifying act that it can transform a sword into a plow, tears into bread, war into peace.

After a page in this vein, the author returns to his point of departure and carries on the story of his origins:

> In this little town on the Inn, gilded by the rays of German martyrdom, Bavarian by blood, technically Austrian, lived my parents in the late eighties of the past century; my father, a dutiful civil servant, my mother giving all her being to the household, and devoted above all to us children in eternal, loving care.

Hitler was born in 1889 in a town far from the world, provincial and unimportant in every sense, into an ordinary family of the lower middle class. He did not feel himself particularly attached to the place, the family moving elsewhere when he was three years old. Its description as being gilded by the memory of German martyrdom, with Bavarian blood running through its veins, places us partly in the obscure and magical world of myth, partly in the late-nineteenth-century Austrian provinces. The outline of his mother, her looking after the household and devoting herself lovingly to the care of her children, is the only thing said of her in the entire book. There is no mention of the fact that she was related to her husband by blood and pregnant when she married him some six months after his first wife had been put in her grave. Nor are we told that the three children to whom she gave birth before Adolf all died, one, a girl, at the age of two, or that the boy she had after Adolf, Edmund, died when he was six. How many siblings Hitler had, what their names were and what kind of feelings he had toward them, are all passed by. They are mentioned merely as "us children." The father is the only person in Hitler's life, during his first thirty-five years, to be described in more than a few words and accorded some biography. Like everyone belonging to Hitler's closest family in Mein Kampf, he appears without a name.

Of "my father," Hitler writes that he was from poor circumstances, son of an impoverished cottager, who ran away from home at the age of thirteen, determined to make something of himself and become a civil servant, the most respected position he had heard of, succeeding at the age of forty, retiring at fifty-six to purchase a small farm at Lambach in Upper Austria. The book tells us nothing of his relationship with his family or Hitler himself. Where the mother is loving and devoted in relation to her children, the father is "a dutiful civil servant." His social trajectory is described in sentimental terms. He is the "poor boy" from the village with "all the tenacity of a young man whom suffering and care had made old while still half a child." Moreover he was born outside wedlock, a bastard child, to all intents and purposes a nobody. Hitler does not deny his father's poor circumstances and low social status, instead making a point of it in a narrative about the power of will and independence. Certainly, Hitler makes no explicit mention of illegitimacy. The description of his father returning after a long and hard-working career to the life his own father had led is part of the same embellishment of the gilded German town of Hitler's birth. This is an idea of lineage, which basically means being born of somebody else, there is in essence nothing qualitative about the concept, nor in the expression to be of "one blood," since blood is in all of us and all of us are born into some lineage. "Lineage" and "blood" create similarity and in this instance elevate, into these concepts vanish the miserable circumstances of life, the low social status of the illegitimate child, and this too is the sense such words are ascribed in Hitler's politics, erasing social divides and making everyone a part of the same thing. Lineage and blood are nature; class and status are culture, and in Hitler's image of the world the former governs. As he later writes when discussing the issue of rapidly increasing population:

> While Nature, by making procreation free, yet submitting survival to a hard trial, chooses from an excess number of individuals the best as worthy of living, thus preserving them alone and in them conserving their species, man limits procreation, but is hysterically concerned that once a being is born it should be preserved at any price. This correction of the divine will seems to him as wise as it is humane, and he takes delight in having once again got the best of Nature and even having proved her inadequacy. The number, to be sure, has really been limited, but at the same time the value of the individual has diminished; this, however, is something the dear little ape of the Almighty does not want to see or hear about.
> For as soon as procreation as such is limited and the number of births diminished, the natural struggle for existence which leaves only the strongest and healthiest alive is obviously replaced by the obvious desire to "save" even the weakest and most sickly at any price, and this plants the seed of a future generation which must inevitably grow more and more deplorable the longer this mockery of Nature and her will continues.

Here, mankind is reduced to numbers, the aggregate being decisive, determinative of power, expressing the will of nature, which is the same as the divine will, and the nameless individual who succumbs to hunger or sickness has no right to life. Keeping such individuals alive is "humane," and thereby counter to nature. Such a perspective was by no means unique to Hitler, it was everywhere in the age and would not have been possible without Darwin and his unprecedentedly influential book, On the Origin of Species, in which all living creatures were considered through the same lens of evolution, this mighty power which through its very few laws has conveyed life from its monocellular origins in the great oceans to the huge complexities of the human. The fittest live on, and thus our life-bearing properties are steadily improved and refined, and since life is one long struggle the fittest are often the strongest, and that thought, translated to the social and the civilizational, comprises a pillar of Mein Kampf, one of the immovable premises from which the rest of its ideology issues. Nature is above culture. In nature the sick die, the weak die, the tardy die, the injured die. The brutality and cruelty of according this same principle so very central a status in culture lies in the worth of the human, the humane, being so radically diminished. A single human life is of little value in Mein Kampf.

But what is of value? The ideal a person can express, or be an expression of, this is of greater value than life. This is what lies behind dying for a cause, the idea that there is something greater, something one lives for and which is understood to be of such manifest importance that a person would be willing to give up his life for it.

Life is not primary.

Hitler wrote his book in 1924, six years after four million young men had slaughtered each other in the trenches of Europe, a shadow that lay over all that was to be thought and written in the years that followed. In the autumn of 1914 a human life was infinitely more worthless than in the autumn of 1913. World War I was an abyss, a near-unfathomable crisis of civilization, and one of the most important issues that needed to be addressed in its wake was precisely the worth of the human being. To understand Mein Kampf, one must understand this.

This is the overarching societal perspective to which the book belongs and by which it is steered, but there is a personal perspective too, the I of its writer, the close and proximate world in which he grew up and by which he was formed, with his conscientious father, the civil servant, and a mother who gave "all her being to the household, and devoted above all to us children in eternal, loving care." In this proximate world death too was close, and if the three children who died before Hitler was born were mentioned only rarely during his childhood and upbringing, they must surely have been present in the minds of his parents, in particular his mother, who sources unanimously describe as serious and mournful. Child mortality was high in those days, to lose three children was by no means unusual. August Kubizek, Hitler's childhood friend, likewise had three siblings die before he was born, and the fact of death being so common must have made life seem at once more and less valuable. Less valuable in the sense that death was something to be reckoned with; the death of one's first three children must have made the death of the fourth a perilously proximate possibility. More valuable in the sense that the one who survived would be the only one, correspondingly precious.

Adolf Hitler was Klara Hitler's fourth child, he was sickly, and yet it was he who survived, and his mother, according to his friend Kubizek, was forever fretting and worrying about him. When the fifth child, Edmund, died, Hitler was eleven years old, old enough to grieve over him and to remember him for the rest of his life.

According to the ideology expressed in Mein Kampf, Hitler's younger brother died because he was too weak and therefore unworthy of life. What Hitler himself thought and felt as an eleven-year-old boy is a matter of conjecture, but it would not seem unreasonable to suggest that he was affected by his brother's death and that he pondered on why it had happened. Why him rather than another? As a teenager Hitler distanced himself from the Church; his mother attended devoutly every Sunday, his friend and his friend's family likewise, but not Hitler, who would stand outside and wait for them, suggesting that he was certainly not looking for any religious explanation of the brutality of existence.

In Mein Kampf everything belonging to Hitler's own biography is related to his ideology. It is not his father's life as such that is significant to him, the person he was in real life, the man whose smell could be described in such and such a way, who walked and stood and sat like this or like that, who expressed himself in this way rather than that and who filled a room with his very own presence, but rather what he in his life represented. His father is presented as a man who worked his way up from the humblest beginnings, in other words he belongs to the strong, and in this way Hitler turns his problematic social background to his advantage, at the same time as he keeps private that which would ruin the trajectory, the striving to surmount, that which takes place in the material world among real people, who not only belong to a lineage, but also belch and shit and yell and lash out, and with a certain regularity drink themselves senseless; who slurp and spit and reek of piss and sweat, who drag their sons here and there by the hair, behavior that presumably cannot have been unusual in the home of a customs official at the end of the nineteenth century – all this vanishes too in the ancestral circle closed by his father's passage from cottager's son to farmer.

But while Hitler translated his father's history into an example of vitality and strength, there is something else in that history that Hitler is not sensitive enough as a writer to be able to control. Almost everything that follows on the subject of his father concerns the disparity between him and his son. The conflict is very much toned down and yet occupies some considerable surface area, and in this asymmetry there is tension.

> It was at this time that the first ideals took shape in my breast. All my playing about in the open, the long walk to school, and particularly my association with extremely "husky" boys, which sometimes caused my mother bitter anguish, made me the very opposite of a stay-at-home. And though at that time I scarcely had any serious ideas as to the profession I should one day pursue, my sympathies were in any case not in the direction of my father's career.

In his own self-image, Hitler is a child of the outdoors, playing with "extremely 'husky' boys," "rather hard to handle," and "a boy who in reality was really anything but 'good' in the usual sense of the word." In other words, he is indignant, obstinate, unruly, perhaps also aggressive, all of which is directed toward his father, no one else being named in this context, his father who could "achieve no understanding" of the "youthful ideas" in his son's head and was thereby made to feel "concern." As a result, his father begins "the relentless enforcement of his authority," this by later accounts involving beatings and harsh corporal punishment. But Hitler lends another side to this depiction:

> I had become a little ringleader; at school I learned easily and at that time very well, but was otherwise rather hard to handle. Since in my free time I received singing lessons in the cloister at Lambach, I had excellent opportunity to intoxicate myself with the solemn splendor of the brilliant church festivals. As was only natural, the abbot seemed to me, as the village priest had once seemed to my father, the highest and most desirable ideal. For a time, at least, this was the case. But since my father, for understandable reasons, proved unable to appreciate the oratorical talents of his pugnacious boy, or to draw from them any favorable conclusions regarding the future of his offspring, he could, it goes without saying, achieve no understanding for such youthful ideas. With concern he observed this conflict of nature.

As it happened, my temporary aspiration for this profession was in any case soon to vanish, making place for hopes more suited to my temperament. Rummaging through my father's library, I had come across various books of a military nature, among them a popular edition of the Franco-German War of 1870–71. It consisted of two issues of an illustrated periodical from those years, which now became my favorite reading matter. It was not long before the great heroic struggle had become my greatest inner experience. From then on I became more and more enthusiastic about everything that was in any way connected with war or, for that matter, with soldiering.

But in another respect as well, this was to assume importance for me. For the first time, though as yet in a confused form, the question was forced upon my consciousness: Was there a difference – and if so what difference – between the Germans who fought these battles and other Germans? Why hadn't Austria taken part in this war; why hadn't my father and all the others fought?

Are we not the same as all other Germans? Do we not all belong together? This problem began to gnaw at my little brain for the first time. I asked cautious questions and with secret envy received the answer that not every German was fortunate enough to belong to Bismarck's Reich.

This was more than I could understand.

Both fascinations are embellishments of reality. The splendor of Church ceremonial, in which he delights, is theatrical and external, whereas the narrative of the heroism of war is an internal transformation, the character of the soldiers, their courage and self-sacrifice giving luster to an otherwise trivial and quotidian reality, not in itself, but in the sympathetic insight into their heroism the books about them make possible, the viewpoint thereby established, the notion that this ordinary landscape could be transformed and become uniquely significant. Both fascinations are associated with his father; the first making Hitler's idealization of the abbot natural, a reflection of his father's veneration of the village priest in his boyhood days. A male ideal to any boy of such age is the ideal of his father, and to Hitler's father nothing was more natural since he had no father of his own. Hitler, however, does, and his idealization of the abbot must be seen in that light. It is this "conflict of nature" in his son's character that makes his father feel anxious. He seeks what is furthest from his father. In the description of his infatuations with war, the two realities, the one in which he grew up and the one he dreamed about, are brought even closer together, the nearest the book gets to an accusation without tearing away the veil of euphemism by which it shrouds all things proximate. Why did Austria not fight? Why did my father and all the others not fight in that struggle?

It is a childish accusation, for there were any number of good reasons for his father not having fought, but the childish nature of it suggests that it preys on him during the time about which he is writing; nothing else in the first three or four pages seems to be so, everything is controlled, held in the same grip and tone as is used throughout the work.

The suggested conflict escalates when a decision is to be made as to what kind of school the eleven-year-old Adolf is to attend. Hitler himself prefers the classical Lyceum, whereas his father wants him to attend the non-classical Realschule.

> Then barely eleven years old, I was forced into opposition for the first time in my life. Hard and determined as my father might be in putting through plans and purposes once conceived, his son was just as persistent and recalcitrant in rejecting an idea which appealed to him not at all, or in any case very little. I did not want to become a civil servant. Neither persuasion nor "serious" arguments made any impression on my resistance.
> I did not want to be a civil servant, no, and again no.

> All attempts on my father's part to inspire me with love or pleasure in this profession by stories from his own life accomplished the exact opposite. I yawned and grew sick to my stomach at the thought of sitting in an office, deprived of my liberty; ceasing to be master of my own time and being compelled to force the content of a whole life into blanks that had to be filled out.

The odd thing is that the book says nothing of how it turned out, what happened, how the conflict ended. Instead, this is merely suggested, a dozen lines on: "In this respect my attendance at the Realschule, which now commenced, made little difference."

He describes an absolutely intractable conflict, he is eleven years old, for the first time confronting the wishes of his father, who is harsh and strict and high-handed, nothing can break down his opposition – and then, although nothing apparently happens, Hitler has given in and is in the midst of everything he so fiercely rejected.

The narrative is clearly hiding something, but what? Is it his defeat itself and the way it must have altered his relationship with his father? His father broke his will, and insofar as he had been open in his opposition and squared up to him in a battle of strength, that defeat must have been humiliating indeed. Yet there is something odd about this entire depiction. That a father should have plans as to his son's education is only natural, but the son being so farsighted in respect to his future as to invest, at the age of eleven, all his strength in opposing his father's will in the matter of something as far off in time as a civil servent's position sounds strange.

Why was it so urgent for Hitler to say that he was sent to the Realschule in Linz against his will? It was a highly respectable school, Ludwig Wittgenstein, born in the same year as Adolf Hitler, went there, and he was from one of the wealthiest and culturally most well-endowed families in Austria, if not the whole of Europe. Wittgenstein and Hitler both did poorly at the school, Hitler especially so, failing in several subjects and having to retake his first year, then failing again in his third year with the result that he was not allowed to continue before improving his grades at another, less prestigious school. Could it be that this whole story of his father forcing him to attend was something he made up, allowing him to state that he could have passed had he wanted to, but that what he wanted was something else, for which reason he saw no reason to make an effort? It sounds like a rather circuitous route.

The conflict surrounding the civil servant's position is escalated further. Hitler attends the Realschule against his will, forced to give in to his father's wishes, but in his own words he is "persistent and recalcitrant" and instead of standing firm on Lyceum over Realschule, he redoubles the conflict a year later:

> How it happened, I myself do not know, but one day it became clear to me that I would become a painter, an artist. There was no doubt as to my talent for drawing; it had been one of my father's reasons for sending me to the Realschule, but never in all the world would it have occurred to him to give me professional training in this direction. On the contrary. When for the first time, after once again rejecting my father's favorite notion, I was asked what I myself wanted to be, and I rather abruptly blurted out the decision I had meanwhile made, my father for the moment was struck speechless.
> "Painter? Artist?"
> He doubted my sanity, or perhaps he thought he had heard wrong or misunderstood me. But when he was clear on the subject, and particularly after he felt the seriousness of my intention, he opposed it with all the determination of his nature. His decision was extremely simple, for any consideration of what abilities I might really have was simply out of the question.
> "Artist, no, never as long as I live!" But since his son, among various other qualities, had apparently inherited his father's stubbornness, the same answer came back at him. Except, of course, that it was in the opposite sense.
> And thus the situation remained on both sides. My father did not depart from his "Never!" And I intensified my "Oh, yes!"
> The consequences, indeed, were none too pleasant. The old man grew embittered, and, much as I loved him, so did I. My father forbade me to nourish the slightest hope of ever being allowed to study art. I went one step further and declared that if that was the case I would stop studying altogether. As a result of > such "pronouncements," of course, I drew the short end; the old man began the relentless enforcement of his authority. In the future, therefore, I was silent, but transformed my threat into reality.

His brother Edmund dies of the measles in February 1900. Hitler begins at the Realschule in Linz in September that same year. How his brother's death affects him is impossible to glean from his own writings about the period. Some biographies describe a transformative impact on his personality, suggesting that Hitler went from pleasant and outgoing to argumentative, sullen, and introverted, but even if this was the case we have no way of knowing what might have occasioned it, all we can do is note that at some point during this time he left one milieu for another, going from a small village school to a big city school where he knew no one and made no friends, and that his brother died some months before. But then again, it was his younger brother who had died, it must have left a crater, and was bound to have darkened his mind and his life in general. Everything his little brother was in life, and then his ceasing to exist, no longer being alive among them, would perhaps be more difficult for an eleven-year-old to accept than to understand. And when the child of a family dies, the grief of its parents is unfathomable; in that grief those who do not die must live on. The parents must have been quite differently attached to him than to those who had died at birth, the future must have been meshed into their gaze whenever they looked at him. The death of a child is a crisis greater than any other, and how can an eleven-year-old relate to that, other than to dwell on the injustice of it? This tragedy resonates through Hitler's years at the Realschule, his disinclination to apply himself, his impudence and self-confidence; he is his own person, with no reason to give a damn apart from his father's attempts to thrash sense into him. The beatings cannot have been decisive in shifting his character, he had been beaten before, it was a circumstance of his life, as doubtless it was for many other children of the time, certainly in that environment. He writes nothing about his mother, nothing about his siblings, nothing about friends, only about his father. If we are to believe his account, the way he sabotages his schooling to demonstrate to his father that he was wrong, then certainly there is something self-destructive about his behavior here. Only a darkened mind would pursue the thought, refuse to work, make him see what he has done, when no other opportunity exists but this to take revenge, no other way to hurt the one you hate. While this entire elaborate operation may conceivably be a concoction designed to excuse Hitler's poor grades and lack of schooling, it is nevertheless descriptive of the remoteness that existed between father and son, a deadlock, though there seems to be no obvious reason to consider it fictitious, since it clearly seems to have been working at various levels and is confirmed by other sources. "The old man . . . as I loved him" would seem to be a rather kind way of referring to an obstinate, cantankerous, and bitter customs official who beats his children senseless, but the representation here is not of Hitler's father, but the more abstract "father," a presence in almost any life, to be looked up to and respected, hence the form Hitler uses slightly further on, "the old gentleman."

Few had much good to say about Alois Hitler, born Schicklgruber. In her book Hitler's Vienna Brigitte Hamann cites one of his acquaintances, Josef Mayrhofer, as saying this of him: "In the bar he always had to be right and had a quick temper . . . At home he was strict, not a gentle man; his wife didn't have an easy life." Yet the picture is by no means unambiguous; the obituary in the Linz Tagespost describes a cheerful and sociable man, "always . . . happy" and "of a downright youthful joyfulness even," Hamann quotes, and also "a friend of song." "Even though a rough word may have escaped his lips once in a while, a good heart was hiding behind a rough exterior," the obituary went on. Basically, then, he would seem to have been a jovial sort socially, a pig at home. To his secretary Hitler later confided that he had not loved his father, and moreover had been frightened of him. "He had tantrums and immediately became physically violent. My poor mother would always be very scared for me." Hitler's older brother, Alois Junior, draws much the same picture, adding that Adolf was spoiled and protected by his mother, Alois Junior's stepmother, who pampered him from morning till night. But Alois Junior too states that Adolf was beaten, on one occasion so brutally he thought him to be dead.

Undeniably the most important source about Hitler's early days in Linz, and to a certain extent in Vienna too, is August Kubizek's book The Young Hitler I Knew: The Memoirs of Hitler's Childhood Friend, which came out in 1953. Kubizek was nine months older than Hitler and they first met at the theater in Linz when they were both sixteen. This means that Kubizek never met Hitler's father, but he became a friend of the family and writes that Alois was still very much a presence in their lives. A large portrait of him adorned the most prominent place on the sitting-room wall; the long pipes he used to smoke were still arrayed on a shelf in the kitchen, and Kubizek writes that they were in some strange way a symbol of the father; often when Frau Hitler spoke of her late husband she would gesture toward his pipes "as though they should bear witness how faithfully she carried on the husband's tradition."

According to Kubizek, the father's colleagues at the customs office described him as precise, dutiful, and strict, proud of his rank, though an unpopular superior. The most notable trait highlighted by Kubizek is a near-manic restlessness. He changes address twelve times during the years he lives in Braunau, twice when living in Passau, and seven times after his retirement. Adolf himself recalls seven different homes and five different schools. The moves had nothing to do with the quality of the dwellings, often he would move to a poorer habitation. Kubizek's explanation is that his temperament required constant change, and since his job demanded stability his restlessness had to find another outlet. Kubizek interprets his starting three different families in his life in the same way; while married to his first wife, a considerably older woman, he was unfaithful with the woman who would become his second wife, and the same thing happened again when he embarked on his affair with Hitler's mother. "This strange and unusual habit of the father's, always to change his circumstances, is all the more remarkable as those were peaceful, comfortable times without any justification for such change."

Kubizek finds exactly the same restlessness and unease in the sixteen-year-old Hitler's character and he sees the civil-servant conflict between father and son as described in Mein Kampf in this very light. The father's volatile nature is kept in check by the demands of his position, the discipline which gave direction and meaning to his unstable character, the uniform of the state official served to conceal his stormy private life; the authority to which he thereby submitted allowed him to steer clear of the dangerous reefs and sandbanks on which his life might otherwise have foundered, Kubizek suggests. The father must have seen the same traits in his son and for this reason would have been more than unusually keen to direct his son's future career. It is by no means certain that Hitler's father was aware of the inner reason for his attitude, Kubizek writes, but his insistence on imposing his point of view would seem to indicate that he indeed realized how much was at stake for his son. "So well did he know him," Kubizek writes.

This idea provides a more sympathetic picture of Hitler's father than is normally presented, and it is neither untrustworthy nor improbable; on the contrary, the traits parents tend to be most implacable toward in their children are often those most similar to their own, and in acts of brutality toward children there is always an element of self-loathing even if one is unaware of its existence, perhaps especially so when the emotions that well to the surface are so powerful and all-consuming as to eliminate any semblance of reason. A will as strong as this, in which the father invests all his power and authority, contains solicitude too, however impossible for a child to understand or recognize, in that it firstly seeks to subjugate the child without listening to his objections or even trying to put oneself in the child's place, and secondly is quite bereft of the language by which love more generally is communicated. Whether such love existed or did not, we have no way of knowing. Hitler's own feelings for his father lay somewhere between hatred, terror, and respect for his authority. The changes of address, the infidelity, the age gaps in the marriages would point toward a troubled and restless soul, and it seems likely that Alois recognized this in his son's rebellious manner. The idea that he knew his son better than his son knew himself shifts the whole conflict away from responsibility and subjugation, or from the mechanical aspect of such responsibility, such subjugation, into something essential, unknown to those involved, who were helpless against themselves.

Where did the notion of becoming a painter come from? There were no artists in the family or its milieu; the closest Hitler came to art must have been what he saw in the churches and what he read about in books. Yet this is what he wants to be when he grows up. Not a soldier, not a priest, not a teacher, not a civil servant, but the absolute opposite of a civil servant, an artist. That Ludwig Wittgenstein should become a philosopher is not in the slightest bit odd or surprising, his world was awash with art and culture, the very finest the contemporary age could offer. But Hitler could draw, and may have been encouraged, he wanted something quite different from the life that surrounded him, so perhaps art seemed to him to be a way out.

His father died suddenly from a violent hemorrhage when Hitler was thirteen.

> The question of my profession was to be decided more quickly than I had previously expected.
> In my thirteenth year I suddenly lost my father. A stroke of apoplexy felled the old gentleman who was otherwise so hale, thus painlessly ending his earthly pilgrimage, plunging us all into the depths of grief. His most ardent desire had been to help his son forge his career, thus preserving him from his own bitter experience. In this, to all appearances, he had not succeeded. But, though unwittingly, he had sown the seed for a future which at that time neither he nor I would have comprehended.

The word "hale" echoes Hitler's use of "husky" to decribe the boys with whom he played, and by association himself, making the notion of robustness a governing one, contrasting with his mother, who is "anguished," and with a sedentary indoor life as a "stay-at-home." "Hale" evokes his father's vitality, a man not in any way sick or in decline.

In the text Hitler's father is the very antithesis of art, the pattern being: indoors/reading/mother/stay-at-home versus outdoors/in the open/friends/combative, and ecclesiastical ceremony/art/freedom versus father/coercion/strength/vitality. "Hale" is an honorific here, held up as a positive, but beneath it flows the nonrobust. The only place where there is a bridge between them is in the description of his reading about the war, where the active, vigorous, and robust aspects of soldiers' heroic lives meet the passive, dreamy, mother-bound stay-at-homeness of reading and art.

His father dies, but Hitler does not leave school to begin with, his mother wishing him to continue. "Then suddenly an illness came to my help and in a few weeks decided my future and the eternal domestic quarrel. As a result of my serious lung ailment, a physician advised my mother in most urgent terms never to send me into an office." The fact of the doctor advising "in most urgent terms" suggests her having to be persuaded, and her having to be persuaded suggests that it was no easy task. The illness seems to have been minor, an excuse to which his mother surrendered. The fact that she gave in to the will of her son is hardly surprising in that she had been witness to her husband's beatings of the boy without being strong enough to step in, he was twice her age and a man of authority, and she had lost four children. Hitler is the survivor, nothing is too good for him.

> The goal for which I had so long silently yearned, for which I had always fought, had through this event suddenly become reality almost of its own accord.
> Concerned over my illness, my mother finally consented to take me out of the Realschule and let me attend the Academy.

When Germany entered Austria in 1938, Hitler ordered the Gestapo to remove all documents relating to himself and his family from the public archives. Seemingly he wished to wipe away all traces of his past. Nevertheless, a wealth of material concerning his life during those years still remains, and hardly a single person who entered his sphere has not been interviewed. The past resists control, it lives on in memory, in recollections and stories, rumor, letters, diaries – and whereas normally such things might never be brought together but remain solely with each individual, spread out in the way fate and destiny spread out the people of any generation, the progress of a single individual may cause them to converge and condense, as in the case of Adolf Hitler. Mein Kampf is by no means an unambiguously credible source, but in giving us a picture of Hitler as he saw himself in 1924 it nevertheless tells us a lot. He describes his childhood the way he wanted it to be, though with elements of his childhood the way it was, intact, in the sense that some key characters and events are included, albeit not all and not necessarily the most significant. The five years that pass between the deaths of first his father, then his mother, are treated in nineteen lines, the two years he lived in Linz with his mother and sister without attending school are dealt with in a single sentence: "These were the happiest days of my life and seemed to me almost a dream; and a mere dream it was to remain. Two years later, the death of my mother put a sudden end to all my high-flown plans."

These two happy, though in Mein Kampf silent, years are dealt with in Kubizek's book. It is the single most important source as to Hitler's life between the ages of sixteen and twenty, and provides at the same time the best documentary insight into Hitler's personality, Kubizek being the only real friend he had in his life.

As in the case of other accounts provided by contemporaries of Hitler, Kubizek's motives and the reliability of the picture he draws must be scrupulously assessed. This indeed has been the case with Kubizek's book. Having pointed out some minor errors, Brigitte Hamann concludes: "Yet altogether, Kubizek is reliable. His book is a rich and unique source for Hitler's early years, not even counting the letters and postcards by young Hitler that it includes."

Ian Kershaw, author of Hitler's two-volume biography, Hubris and Nemesis, is more critical, stating:

> Kubizek's postwar memoirs need to be treated with care, both in factual detail and in interpretation. They are a lengthened and embellished version of recollections he had originally been commissioned by the Nazi Party to compile. Even retrospectively, the admiration in which Kubizek continued to hold his former friend colored his judgment. But more than that, Kubizek plainly invented a great deal, built some passages around Hitler's own account in Mein Kampf, and deployed some near plagiarism to amplify his own limited memory. However, for all their weaknesses, his recollections have been shown to be a more > credible source on Hitler's youth than was once thought, in particular where they touch on experiences related to Kubizek's own interests in music and theater. There can be no doubt that, whatever their deficiencies, they do contain important reflections of the young Hitler's personality, showing features in embryo which were to be all too prominent in later years.

The reasoning here is typical of Kershaw's work, which is marred by his describing everything, and I mean everything, about Hitler extremely negatively, even such aspects as relate to his childhood and youth, as if his whole life were tainted by what he would become and do some twenty years later, as if in some way he were evil incarnate, or as if evil were some core inside him, immutable and irremediable, and thereby an explanation of why things turned out the way they did. Such an understanding of Hitler is immature, and makes Kershaw's books, renowned as the definitive Hitler biography, almost unreadable. Is it possible for everything a person does, even when that person is sixteen years old, to be appalling and bad? Kershaw's descriptions of Hitler's youth are invariably thickly strewn with negatives. He writes of the father's aversion to his son's "indolent and purposeless existence," he writes that "Alois had worked his way up through industry, diligence and effort from humble origins to a position of dignity and respect in the state service," whereas his son "from a more privileged background saw fit to do no more than dawdle away his time drawing and dreaming." Given the evidence to suggest the father would beat the daylights out of his son and was in every sense a domestic tyrant, casting the father as the hero and the son as the villain in this way appears severe indeed.

The transformation in Hitler's character that would seem to have occurred in his adolescence is described by Kershaw in the following manner: "The happy, playful youngster of the primary school days had grown into an idle, resentful, rebellious, sullen, stubborn, and purposeless teenager." Of the time between Hitler leaving school at sixteen and his mother's death when he was eighteen he writes, "In these two years, Adolf lived a life of parasitic idleness – funded, provided for, looked after, and cosseted by a doting mother."

> He spent his time during the days drawing, painting, reading, or writing "poetry"; the evenings were for going to the theater or opera; and the whole time he daydreamed or fantasized about his future as a great artist. He stayed up late into the night and slept long into the mornings. He had no clear aim in view. The indolent lifestyle, the grandiosity of fantasy, the lack of discipline for systematic work – all features of the later Hitler – can be seen in these two years in Linz.

How great the disdain in the inverted commas dashed around "poetry"! And how conservative the negative inflection concerning his staying up late and sleeping into the mornings! How often he states that the boy was "indolent" or "lazy," that his existence was "purposeless" or "parasitic," and how negatively charged the words "daydream," "fantasize," "dream"! Together with the idea of drawing being a "dawdling away" of one's time, all this is the very expression of the mind-set and attitudes that Hitler's life at that time would seem to be protesting against. If we substitute "Hitler" with "Rilke," for instance, and imagine someone writing of the young Rilke that he was indolent, lazy, and parasitic, with no aptitude for systematic work, that he stayed up late and lay in bed in the mornings when he was sixteen; if one read such a damning rant in a biography of Rilke, one would be left perplexed at the author's outlook on life and art. Kershaw views everything even verging on art negatively, art being construed as the opposite of actual work. Of course, it might be objected that Hitler was no true artist, and that such damnation thereby is justified, but when a boy is sixteen years old no one can possibly know what he will become or not become, and it is by no means a given that artistic talent was what primarily distinguished Hitler and Rilke when they were sixteen.

Kubizek's picture of Hitler is drawn from within this reality, of which Kershaw is so disdainful, and it is a picture of a young man fired with enthusiasm for life. Hitler lives for the opera, for the theater, for music, for poetry, for painting, for architecture. He writes poetry, he draws, he paints watercolors, he draws and designs buildings as he sees and imagines them. Instead of wondering about where such vigorous interests could come from and what they might express, as striking and conspicuous as they are in the young Hitler's life, such a powerful presence in his first twenty-five years, Kershaw sees them as an expression of Hitler's personal, and thereby base, character. But he is sixteen years old, his poetry is bound to be poor, the buildings he draws in detail cannot possibly match the work of a trained architect, obviously he is a dilettante, but what sixteen-year-old is not?

Kubizek's description of his friendship with Hitler, and of the time and milieu in which that friendship occurred, where music, art, and literature provide the very fulcrum of youth, is reminiscent of the picture Stefan Zweig gives of his formative years in Vienna in his memoir The World of Yesterday. Zweig was ten years older than Hitler, and what he writes about Austria in the years prior to the outbreak of World War I, that it was a period characterized by stability and liberal idealism, a "Golden Age of Security," as he calls it, must also have been true of life in Linz in 1905–6.

Zweig's description of his youth in Vienna emphasizes how obsessed he and his friends were with everything to do with culture. They line up outside the theaters for every opening night, the poems of Rilke are stuck between the covers of their Latin grammars at school, they sneak-read Nietzsche and Strindberg under their desks, they keep up with literary criticism and follow all the discussions, and if one of them should spot Gustav Mahler on the street one evening, the event would be proudly reported at school the very next morning.

> A première of Gerhart Hauptmann's in the Burgtheater had our entire class on edge for weeks before the rehearsals began. We slipped in to the actors and understudies to be the first – before the others! – to know the plot and learn about the cast. We had (I do not hesitate to report upon absurdities) our hair cut by the barber of the Burgtheater, so that we could gather secret information about Wolter or Sonnenthal, and a pupil in one of the lower classes was particularly spoiled by us older boys and bribed with all sorts of attentions, merely because he was the nephew of one of the lighting inspectors at the Opera, and through him we were sometimes smuggled on to the stage during rehearsals – the shock of treading on that stage exceeded that of Virgil when he mounted into the holy > circles of Paradise. The radiant power of fame was so strong for us that even if it were seven times removed from us, it still forced us to respect it; a certain poor little old woman seemed like an immortal being to us because she was a grand-niece of Franz Schubert, and on the street we gazed respectfully at Josef Kainz's valet because he had the good fortune to be close to the most beloved and most genial of all actors.

Stefan Zweig was a Jew born into Vienna's upper bourgeoisie. He wrote his memoirs under the shadow of the brutal and destructive regime of Nazism before committing suicide "in despair at the fall of European culture," as it says on the cover of the Norwegian edition of The World of Yesterday. Few have provided a better or more fascinating picture of the lost reality of prewar Europe than Zweig in that book. This is the golden age of the middle class, a time of wealth, continuity, caution, harmony, and security, so staidly sedate that the ideal to which its youth aspires is middle age; he writes that anyone wishing to get along in life was compelled to conceal his youth in every conceivable way. Young men of twenty-four and twenty-five grew impressive beards and acquired paunches, strolled leisurely in long frock coats, and wore glasses even if their vision was perfect.

Thomas Mann's first novel, Buddenbrooks, published in 1901, provides the same double exposure as Zweig's memoir: on the one hand the staidness of commercial prosperity and an unfluctuating bourgeois existence, on the other the children of this bourgeoisie and their fascination with art and the culture of the great emotions, who in Mann's universe invariably have something fragile and almost destructive about them. Citizen and artist, these are the two figures both Mann and Zweig hold up for scrutiny. Mann's Munich and Zweig's Vienna were among the great centers of European culture at the twentieth century's beginning, but although Hitler was to live in both cities, at the same time as Zweig in Vienna and Mann in Munich, he was separated from the culture of which the two were a part by what amounted to an abyss. Hitler's Vienna was a slum, Hitler's Munich not much better. Yet despite the great social divide between them, Hitler still frequented the same world; during his time in Vienna he attended Gustav Mahler's stagings of Wagner's operas, which he admired greatly, and on his arrival in the city he carried with him a letter of recommendation to the famous Alfred Roller, not only a professor at the academy of arts, but also Mahler's collaborator and scenographer, a person Zweig and his friends would have turned their heads to look at on the street. This recommendation had come about through the owner of the Hitler family's apartment in Linz, a woman who had taken a liking to the young Adolf; she knew Roller's brother and wrote the following about him to a female friend in Vienna, quoted in Hitler's Vienna:

> The son of one of my tenants is becoming a painter, has gone to school in Vienna since the fall, he wanted to attend the Austro-Hungarian Academy of Visual Arts, but was not accepted and went to a private institution instead (Panholzer I believe). He is a serious, ambitious young man, nineteen years old, more mature and settled than his age indicates, nice and sensible, from a perfectly decent family. His mother died before Christmas, suffered from breast cancer, was only forty-six years old, the widow of a higher-up official at the local main customs office; I liked the woman very much, she lived next to me on the first floor; her sister and her daughter, who is in high school, are keeping the apartment for the time being. The family's name is Hitler; the son, in whose behalf I'm asking your help, is called Adolf Hitler. We happened to talk about art and artists the other day, and among others, he mentioned that Professor Roller is a famous man among artists, not only in Vienna, but one could even say he has world renown, and that he reveres him in his works. Hitler had no idea that I am familiar with the name Roller, and when I told him that I used to know a brother of the famous Roller and asked him if it might be helpful to him in his endeavors if he received a recommendation to the director of the Court Opera's Scenery Department, the young man's eyes started glowing; he flushed crimson and said he would consider it the best luck he ever had if he could meet that man and got a recommendation to him! I would love to help the young man; he simply has no one who could put in a good word for him or help him by word and deed; he arrived in Vienna a complete stranger and alone, and had to go everywhere alone, without anyone giving him direction, to > find entrance. He has the firm intention of learning something solid! So far as I have got to know him, he won't "operate in a low gear," since he is focusing on a serious goal; I hope you won't waste your good offices on someone unworthy!

Roller replied by return of post in a three-page letter, writing among other things, "Do tell young Hitler to call on me and to bring some of his works so I can see how he is doing. I surely will advise him as best I can. He can meet me every day in my office at the Opera, entrance Kärntherstrasse, Principal Offices staircase, at 12:30 and at 6:30 p.m."

But Hitler never appeared. Later he would say that his courage had failed him. He had gone to the Opera some days after arriving in Vienna, but had not found it in him to go in and had turned around instead. After much deliberation with himself he conquered his fear and went back, only with the same result, he was too scared. On a third occasion he had been standing outside Roller's office when someone asked him his business and he had muttered an apology and fled. After that he destroyed the letter of recommendation and never returned. At this point he had been turned down by the Academy, so there was much at stake for him; an introduction to Roller would clearly have been invaluable to a provincial teenager wanting to become a painter. If nothing else Roller could have cast an eye over Hitler's sketches and pictures and told him what aspects of his work he should try to develop, what was good about them and what was lacking, thereby equipping him better in case he should try again for admission to the Academy. Hitler's problem was that he was self-taught and had little if any contact with other artists or artistic communities. This meant he was most likely unaware of what was required, unaware of what was important, and to anyone wanting to get into one of the major institutions, such ignorance would be fatal; these places were the very seat of the cultural establishment

But still he lacked the courage. Why? One reason is shyness, and Roller was a man he admired greatly, he had seen two of Mahler's Wagner operas to which Roller had contributed, Tristan and The Flying Dutchman, to speak to him must have been to speak to a god; another likely reason is that he feared rejection. The artist identity was so important to him, he had gone through so much in order to keep it alive, defying his father's will, then his mother's, and, after they were dead, the forceful wishes of his remaining family and his guardian. Everyone expected him to get a normal job, to grow up, earn his own money, start a family. Shortly before leaving home for Vienna he was offered a job at the local post office by a relative. He turned it down, presumably not without contempt, for according to Kubizek there was always contempt in his voice when he spoke of "bread-and-butter" jobs. Art was Hitler's opposition to civil life, and so strong was the dream of art inside him that he found himself unable to run the risk of Roller deeming him without talent and advising him to go back to Linz and get himself a job like anyone else. He could not risk having to face such a fate, even if it were to become reality. Better then to live on with the dream.

A typical trait of Hitler's, revealing itself on many occasions described by Kubizek, seems to be that he lives a vital inner life, intensely nourished by fantasies he goes to great lengths to preserve from any confrontation with reality. Perhaps the most typical example of this is his four-year infatuation with Stefanie, a young Linz girl who catches his eye on a number of occasions on the Landstrasse in the center of the city, where Linzers would stroll in the afternoons and evenings, to see and be seen, to stop and chat with friends and acquaintances, to look in the shop windows, enjoying provincial life as it was lived at the time. One evening in 1905 when Kubizek and Hitler are out taking their usual stroll, Kubizek writes, Hitler suddenly grips his arm excitedly and asks him what he thinks of the slim blond girl walking arm-in-arm with her mother along the boulevard.

I am in love with her, Hitler says.

It transpires that he has never spoken to her. The evening strolls along the Landstrasse were occasions for flirting, for glances and smiles, yet the formalities were strict; if he wanted to speak to her he would first have to be introduced, a matter that lay beyond his reach, as Kubizek explains. Hitler asks him what he should do, Kubizek tells him he should approach the mother, introduce himself and ask her permission to address the daughter and escort them.

> Adolf looked at me doubtfully and pondered my suggestion for quite a while. In the end, however, he rejected it. "What am I to say if the mother wants to know my profession? After all, I have to mention my profession straight away; it would be best to add it to my name – 'Adolf Hitler, academic painter' or something similar. But I am not yet an academic painter, and I can't introduce myself until I am. For the mama, the profession is even more important than the name."

Hitler never takes that step, never approaches the mother to introduce himself, consequently he does not exchange a single world with the girl during the four years that ensue, a time in which according to Kubizek she is Hitler's great love. He makes do with looking at her from afar. Now and then their eyes meet, now and then he receives a smile, making him certain that her feelings for him are just as great as his own for her. He plans out a future down to the smallest detail; he even draws up plans for the house in which they will live; for a time he is utterly absorbed in the project. He writes poems about her, "Hymn to the Beloved" is the title of one, according to Kubizek's account. Stefanie is a near-dreamlike, perfect, and utterly idealized woman, perhaps best related to Wagner's mythological heroines, and when the real world, so compelling that it cannot be denied forever, intervenes, Hitler's reaction is one of anger. He has asked Kubizek to investigate her background, and Kubizek has spoken with an acquaintance who is a friend of her brother's. Her family is of the upper middle class, he finds out, and she lives with her mother, a widow, and likes to dance; the previous winter she had attended all the important dances in the town along with her mother. As far as Kubizek's acquaintance knew, she was not engaged. Hitler is highly satisfied with the report, apart from one thing, the fact that she dances. The thought does not accord at all with his image of her, nor with the life he leads himself.

Kubizek describes Hitler as an exceptionally serious person, dedicated to his interests, which at the time are mostly art and architecture. He doesn't drink, doesn't smoke, has no interest in sports, no interest in provincial social life. Dance is completely alien to him. The fact of her dancing, and thereby belonging to that life, troubles him intensely.

> After having been his butt for so long, at last I had a chance of pulling his leg. I proclaimed with a straight face, "You must take dancing lessons, Adolf." Dancing immediately became one of his problems. I well remember that our lonely perambulations were no longer punctuated by discussions on "the theater" or "reconstruction of the bridge over the Danube" but were dominated by one subject – dancing.
> As with everything that he couldn't tackle at once, he indulged in generalizations. "Visualize a crowded ballroom," he once said to me, "and imagine that you are deaf. You can't hear the music to which these people are moving, and then take a look at their senseless progress, which leads nowhere. Aren't these people raving mad?"
> "All this is no good, Adolf," I replied. "Stefanie is fond of dancing. If you want to conquer her, you will have to dance around just as aimlessly and idiotically as the others." That was all that was needed to set him off raving. "No, no, never!" he screamed at me. "I shall never dance! Do you understand! Stefanie only dances because she is forced to by society on which she unfortunately depends. Once she is my wife, she won't have the slightest desire to dance!"
> Contrary to the rule, this time his own words did not convince him; for he brought up the question of dancing again and again. I rather suspected that, secretly at home, he practiced a few cautious steps with his little sister.

To extract himself from this torment, Hitler came up with the idea of kidnapping Stefanie. This was something he seriously contemplated, Kubizek writes. When for a time she seemed unfriendly and would avert her gaze, passing Hitler on the street as if he did not exist, he began to despair, proclaiming that he would commit suicide, an act as meticulously detailed in his imagination as all his other plans. Sometime later, however, she takes part in a festival parade and tosses him a flower. Kubizek writes that he would never again see Adolf as happy as he was at that moment. "I can still hear his voice, trembling with excitement, 'She loves me! You have seen! She loves me!'" When Hitler moves to Vienna after his mother's death two and a half years later, in February 1908, with the letter of recommendation addressed to Roller, he sends Stefanie a postcard saying that he is to begin at the Academy and that she must wait for him, he intends to ask for her hand as soon as his studies are completed and he returns to Linz. He leaves the card unsigned, and she has no idea who on earth might have sent it to her.

The ambivalence of not putting his name to his words is the same failing as emerges in his inability to act on his introduction to Roller – he lacks the courage to take the final step. The world he dreams about, his future as an artist, his future with Stefanie, exists partly within him and partly without – he seeks her out, he sees her, she exists, the future is possible, in the same way as he sketches and paints and puts his work forward to the Academy with a view to acceptance – yet he is too afraid to actually join these two planes of reality together. What reality does, and brutally so, is to correct. And a prominent trait of the young Hitler's character is precisely an unwillingness to accept correction. It is anathema to him. Even the slightest contradiction incenses him and leaves him indignant.

It is hard not to see his inner strength and its expression as a means of defense. But against what? Seemingly against the social world. Hitler takes no part whatsoever in any social life, he is completely uninterested by it and looks with disdain on his contemporaries as they have fun, drinking and dancing, playing sports and flirting. He has no friends either; Kubizek appears to be the exception, but their friendship is basically monological: Hitler talks, Kubizek listens. Hitler is primary, Kubizek secondary. Kubizek knows this and accepts it since he admires Hitler and feels advantaged by his friendship; moreover, so he writes, he understands that Hitler needs him.

> Soon I came to understand that our friendship endured largely for the reason that I was a patient listener. But I was not dissatisfied with this passive role, for it made me realize how much my friend needed me. He, too, was completely alone.

At one point Kubizek has to attend a funeral, his former violin teacher having died, and to his surprise Hitler decides to go with him. Hitler had no association with Kubizek's teacher, so why would he want to go to his funeral? Hitler replies, "I can't bear it that you should mix with other young people and talk to them."

He wants Kubizek for himself, which in a way is touching, revealing vulnerability, yet disturbing too in that he almost wants to own him.

What is it then about Hitler that Kubizek so admires?

Above all, perhaps, it was his standing apart from his contemporaries, to Kubizek's mind radically so. Most had their lives mapped out by the time they were sixteen; Hitler had not, he was "just the opposite" as Kubizek states. "With him everything was uncertain." His shunning of middle-class life appealed to Kubizek, who worked in his father's upholstery workshop and was expected by everyone to eventually take over the family business, whereas what he himself wanted, a wish he hardly dared utter to anyone, was to train as a musician and conductor. When Hitler moved to Vienna, he insisted on Kubizek following, approaching Kubizek's parents himself and managing to convince them to allow his friend to leave.

Hitler, then, represented something Kubizek himself wanted to become. However, they were by no means alike. Kubizek hardly spoke when they were together and had none of his friend's restless energy, though he possessed the patience Hitler lacked. Kubizek practiced and was admitted to the conservatory in Vienna at the age of eighteen, whereas Hitler practiced nothing, had no patience, threw himself into the loftiest projects without ever completing them, and would never gain admittance to Vienna's Academy.

Hitler's most striking trait, acccording to Kubizek, was his holding forth on everything he saw and thought about, usually involving some form of change: a building in one style, he might suggest, ought to be pulled down to make way for another in a different style, Linz needed an underground railway, a pension scheme required an overhaul, a traveling opera had to be set up to bring Wagner to the outlying districts. Seemingly there were no limits to what he might take an interest in and hold an opinion about. Describing this aspect of his friend's personality, Kubizek emphasizes the restlessness of which it was an expression, his need for things to happen, and this gives an impression of Hitler as being in some way menaced, as if there were something he needed to get away from, and since the things that caught his attention in this way were so external, there always being some element of his surroundings with which to take issue, it is easy to think that there was something inside him that he wanted to escape or get rid of. A conspicuous aspect of what is revealed of Hitler's inner life in Mein Kampf as well as in Kubizek's memoir is his almost dreamlike remoteness from reality, as if he were turned toward another age, another place, whether rooted in the intense experiences the two friends shared at the opera, which they frequented, in what he would read of German history and mythology, or in what he would relate of his own life, which never was concerned with what it was but what it would become. To this picture belongs the wholly asocial nature of his character, his disinterest in social life, and his strikingly serious demeanor.

> I have often been asked, and even by Rudolf Hess, who once invited me to visit him in Linz, whether Adolf, when I knew him, had any sense of humor. One feels the lack of it, people of his entourage said. After all, he was an Austrian and should have had his share of the famous Austrian sense of humor. Certainly one's impression of Hitler, especially after a short and superficial acquaintance, was that of a deeply serious man. This enormous seriousness seemed to overshadow everything else. It was the same when he was young. He approached any problem with which he was concerned with a deadly earnestness which ill suited his sixteen or seventeen years. He was capable of loving and admiring, hating and despising, all with the greatest seriousness. But one thing he could not do was pass over something with a smile.

Kubizek finds the same earnestness in Hitler's mother. When he meets her she is forty-five years old. He writes that she still looked like the only known photograph of her, but that "the suffering was more clearly etched in her face and her hair had started to go gray." He felt sympathy for her, stating that she made him feel like he wanted to do something for her. "Every smile which crossed that serious face gave me joy," he writes. She was disinclined to talk about herself and her worries, yet found relief in confiding to Kubizek her concerns about Adolf and the uncertainty of his future.

> Her preoccupation with the well-being of her only surviving son depressed her increasingly. Often I sat together with Frau Hitler and Adolf in the tiny kitchen. "Your poor father cannot rest in his grave," she used to say to Adolf, "because you do absolutely nothing that he wanted for you. Obedience is what distinguishes a good son, but you do not know the meaning of the word. That's why you did so badly at school and why you're not getting anywhere now."

The family lived in a small flat comprising two rooms and a kitchen. Hitler had one room for himself, while his mother, his half sister, and his younger sister shared the other. He never helped out at home, his mother did everything for him, and there is no doubt he was spoiled. At one point he announced that he wanted to learn the piano, his mother bought him one and paid for lessons, all presumably beyond her means. After four months Hitler gave up, enraged by his teacher's insistence on "stupid" finger exercises. Music was about inspiration, not finger exercises, he declared, and laid his ambitions to rest. Placing the blame for his inadequacy on his music teacher was typical of him. He read all he could lay his hands on about Wagner and identified almost entirely with him; the adversity he encountered in his young life was the same as the young Wagner had to battle against. "So you see," he would say after quoting from some letter or essay, "even Wagner went through it just like I have. All the time he had to tackle the ignorance of his surroundings." Kubizek found these comparisons somewhat exaggerated, Wagner having led a long and productive life with plenty of ups and downs, whereas Hitler was only sixteen years old with hardly any experience at all. Nevertheless he spoke "as though he had been the victim of persecution, fought his enemies and been exiled."

There is something of the poseur about this side of Hitler in the sense that it is the role itself that seems to appeal to him, an impression accentuated by his inability to invest the role with the necessary practice and talent, and by the way he dresses, the young dandy in black coat and white shirt, the ivory-handled cane, on occasion even a black top hat, and yet the matter is not as simple, he does not do this to impress or to be seen, since basically he is on his own, and the intensity with which he absorbs himself in the operas they attend, for instance, seems anything but affected or shallow and would seem to saturate his entire being. The same is true of the frenzy he exhibits when devoting himself to his architectural drawings, which often lie scattered about his room. He is impassioned, burns with enthusiasm, is willing to put everything else aside for their sake. Why? Both Hitler and Kubizek believe in the supreme position of art in human life, and in that belief they express a rather typical attitude of the age in which they live, in the provinces shared only by a small handful of young people, certainly, yet highly prevalent in Vienna and the other major cities. From the picture Kubizek paints of Hitler this would seem to be not simply a fad but so much a part of his character as to be imperative. "His intense way of absorbing, scrutinizing, rejecting, his terrific seriousness, his ever-active mind needed a counterpoise," Kubizek writes. "And only art could provide this."

Noticeable in Kubizek's descriptions of Hitler are the elements of mania he exhibits; Hitler talks incessantly, he is quick-tempered and irritable, he harbors grand designs and seems never to doubt that he will see them through to completion, and he can work frenetically on a project for nights on end. On the other hand, and such loftiness always has its counterweight, there are periods where Hitler does not appear to speak at all but withdraws and goes for long walks on his own in the environs of Linz, dejected and dispirited. Art is somewhere outside this, and he seeks it presumably so that something else may fill his soul and that he may express himself in it.

Another obvious reason for art being so important to him as a teenager was that it was the only way he could see of moving beyond the social class from which he came. This becomes apparent in his remote infatuation with Stefanie. Why does he not approach her? He is bashful and clearly lacks the courage. Perhaps he has no will or feels unable to try his fortune, knowing at some level that to make his desires known to her would be for reality to intrude on the dream and that the perfection and ideal of the dream is preferable to inadequate reality. Moreover, there is the fact that he is a nobody. Pressed by Kubizek, this is what he says, that to introduce himself to the mother he needs to be someone, to have a profession, and not just any profession, a postman, for instance, would not impress her, the widow of a high-standing official, but an academic painter would fit the bill admirably.

In a certain sense art is classless insofar as it is available to all; in Linz in the first decade of the twentieth century there were no such things as television, radio, gramophones, or cinemas; music had to be heard live, though it cost little, and these two sixteen-year-olds of the lower middle class frequented the theater and the opera and attended all manner of concerts, absorbing everything, and on their way home they would be fired with enthusiasm, discussing what they had seen and heard; admission to art galleries was cheap too, and then there were books. In another sense art too is a class issue. The fact that it exists and is available does not mean that it is actually accessible to all; anyone growing up in a home without books, without pictures, without music, among people who never speak of art and do not care for it, perhaps even think it to be a waste of time and money, has no easy path in art's direction. And even if they discover that path and venture along it, they will more than likely find themselves lacking the basic means possessed by those belonging to more elevated classes, the self-assurance with which they embrace culture and its expressions. Hitler, who came from a home quite without books and with no interest at all in art, overcame this first hindrance, though would never wholly surmount those that remained. His taste in art, and his understanding of it, was throughout his life always provincial and conservative, even though at the time he lived in the provinces and opposed the petty bourgeois with all his might, his attitudes and ideas must have seemed radical to those in his surroundings.

This radical streak is what Kubizek finds so striking about Hitler when they first meet. They notice each other at the opera and strike up a conversation in the intermission of a late performance, and from then on it was as if Hitler monopolizes him completely. Whenever Kubizek is late for an appointment, Hitler will go at once to fetch him from his father's upholstery workshop; he has no understanding of the fact that his friend must work, insisting that they stroll through the town together, more often than not with Hitler holding forth.

Kubizek is surprised that Hitler has so much time on his hands, does he not work? Of course not, Hitler snaps back, the very idea of a "bread-and-butter" job is beneath him. Kubizek is rather impressed by this, yet finds it somewhat puzzling. Perhaps this Adolf is a student at a school somewhere? "School?" Hitler snorts back at him in a first outburst of temper. The mere mention of the word incenses him, school is a red rag. He hates it, hates the teachers, hates his classmates.

Kubizek tells him how little success he had at school himself.

Hitler demands to know the reason for this, apparently dissatisfied with his new friend having done poorly. This self-contradiction confuses Kubizek but is something he will soon get used to; self-contradictions are a characteristic of Hitler. In this first instance in the upholstery workshop, however, it seems innocuous enough. Self-contradiction arises when two incompatible utterances collide, and in this case they are easy to identify: Hitler's experiences apply to him alone, they are his, perhaps precious and inalienable in that they define his character, he hates school and the very notion of it, and this makes him what he is, an independent man with no need of what school could possibly give him, no intention of assimilating himself into the society it represents, the petty bourgeois world of Linz, for he is destined for greater things in the wider world. Kubizek sharing that same experience would mean Hitler was no longer unique, and this he cannot tolerate.

However, this simply does not exist for him as an insight, he is completely blind to it; for Kubizek different rules apply, Hitler does not regard him in the same light as he regards himself, but wholly from without, and in that external light not doing well at school looks like failure. Is his new friend a failure? A failure in the eyes of his teachers and the other students? No, he does not care for the thought; Kubizek doing badly at school is not good at all.

What this little scene reveals is the gap between Hitler's inner and outer selves, how distinctly they are separated, and this separation is significant in that the inner self is thereby beyond reach and unamenable to correction. Self-insight is the ability to apply the outer perspective to the inner, it is the presence in the ego of the voice or gaze of the indefinite other, and if that is prevented, then the two will be unconnected, there will be no accommodation within the ego, which then will be left to its own devices, and this abandonment means that interaction with and understanding of others essentially becomes an external phenomenon, occurring outside the I, without empathy, without involvement of the inner self, which is empathy's first and to all intents and purposes only condition.

Hitler was by no means wholly unable to empathize with others, but his empathy was weak; everything Kubizek writes suggests it. He was ruled by emotions, almost in their thrall, they could overpower him, overcome him completely; this too is in the pattern of the abandoned ego. His asocial nature too. And not only was he asocial, he avoided moreover all points of potential confrontation between his inner and outer selves, as the examples of Stefanie and Roller show. Nor would he tolerate any kind of dissent from Kubizek or his mother. On the other hand, he was only sixteen years old, at a stage of his development when a person is perhaps the most challenging of life, hurtling on, and in turmoil.

Later Hitler would refer to the two years in Linz as the happiest of his life. Just as Kubizek was a frequent visitor in his home, Hitler spent much time in Kubizek's. Kubizek's mother was fond of him, he was polite and well brought up, Kubizek's father being rather more skeptical, he had hoped his son might find a more stable and dependable friend, sensing perhaps the direction in which he was going, the lure of the upholstery business pale compared to the world of music that now seemed to open itself to him even more.

On weekends, Hitler and Kubizek enjoyed going for long walks together into the countryside, often meeting up with Kubizek's parents, who would take the train to some appointed place and treat them to a meal at a local inn. Hitler was fond of them and attentive to their well-being; as late as 1944 he would send Kubizek's mother a present on her eightieth birthday.

The provincial prewar life Kubizek describes seems quite as sleepy and secure as Zweig's descriptions of his young days in Vienna ten years earlier. Evening strolls along the boulevard, Schiller at the theater, and Wagner at the opera, bandstand concerts, long walks and outings in the surrounding countryside. There are no cars, no planes, hardly any engines of any kind, no telephones, no radio or television, barely an electric light. They are, however, anything but wealthy; Kubizek's father toils to keep his tiny business running, Hitler's mother scrimps and saves to make her widow's pension last. Poverty is no abstract concept, something that only applies to others: Hitler's mother came from the humblest of circumstances in one of Austria's poorest regions, one of twelve children. The young Hitler's contempt for the petty bourgeoisie must have grown out of a strong though probably unarticulated class consciousness; he came from quite a different background to the vast majority of his classmates in the Realschule, it took him an hour to get there in the mornings and there was something rural and unsophisticated about him, and when later he moves to Linz with his mother, he refuses even to talk to them – Kubizek mentions an episode when Hitler is approached by a former schoolmate who asks him sincerely how he is doing, Hitler instantly flies into a rage and tells him it's none of his business – but his sense of being better than them, these representatives of the provincial bourgeoisie, who complete their schooling and take on normal work, must find articulation in some way, and this is a problem: how to rise above something basically unfamiliar to him, how to abandon and leave behind a level for which he has never really qualified himself? He dresses like a student or a young artist and insists he will never take on ordinary work as long as he lives, he is certain of it. He despises middle-classness and yet is its captive.

> Adolf set great store by good manners and correct behavior. He observed with painstaking punctiliousness the rules of social conduct, however little he thought of society itself . . . It is most revealing that the young Hitler, who so thoroughly despised bourgeois society, nevertheless, as far as his love affair was concerned, observed its codes and etiquette more strictly than many a member of the > bourgeoisie itself . . . It was apparent in his neat dress, and in his correct behavior, as much as in his natural courtesy, which my mother liked so much about him. I have never heard him use an ambiguous expression or tell a doubtful story.

The young Hitler is acutely aware of the importance of dress and behavior in assessing a person, and while he couldn't care less about the bouorgeoisie, in actual fact he has no choice, being wholly without qualifications: if he dressed like an ill-bred peasant or an ignorant son of the lower middle class, there would be nothing separating them, he would be exactly that in the eye of the beholder, and with justification, so if he is to elevate himself to the status he believes he deserves, he has no other means than correctness, which, with a little dash of effort, can be embellished with the panache and flair of the dandy, the young artist.

The Young Hitler I Knew was published more than forty years after the events it portrays. As Ian Kershaw points out, no one can remember exactly what was said in a given situation decades later, the way Kubizek pretends when quoting both Hitler and Hitler's mother. But memoirs are no exact science, readers understand this and know from their own lives how later events twist and turn what happened at some earlier time, adding new shades, illuminating from new angles according to where we are in life. We need to be alert whenever events shape themselves into narratives, for narratives belong to literature and not to life, and occurrences of the past seep into and absorb expectations of the future, for the true present stands open and knows as yet no consequence. So when Kubizek allows the story of Hitler's infatuation with Stefanie to coincide with the death of his mother, in a scene where the funeral cortège passes Stefanie's house and she at that very moment opens the window and leans out to see what is going on, we should have every reason to doubt that this was how it actually happened. And when Kubizek describes how deeply affected Hitler was by a performance of Wagner's opera Rienzi, about a Roman demagogue –

> Adolf stood in front of me and now he gripped both my hands and held them tight. He had never made such a gesture before. I felt from the grasp of his hands how deeply moved he was. His eyes were feverish with excitement. The words did not come smoothly from his mouth as they usually did, but rather erupted, hoarse and raucous. From his voice I could tell even more how much this experience had shaken him.
> Gradually his speech loosened and the words flowed more freely. Never before and never again have I heard Adolf Hitler speak as he did in that hour, as we stood there alone under the stars, as though we were the only creatures in the world.

– there is no doubt that they saw the opera and that it made an impression on them both, but the definitive and fateful aspect the description lends to the moment, the sense that Hitler gazed into the future and found his destiny is obviously constructed after the event, as Kershaw points out. Much of what Kubizek writes about Hitler is in this way colored by what was to happen, which does not mean to say that what he writes did not take place, only that those events were not accorded any such weight at the time, were not in any way inclined toward fortunes at which neither could as much as hazard a guess. But the advantage of Kubizek's memoir is that the period with which it deals is sufficiently short, and the events sufficiently small and quotidian, as to hinder the construction and development of any larger narrative, at the same time as the temporal constraint, the fact of Kubizek never having met Hitler until he was sixteen years old, and not meeting him again until almost thirty years later, frames the events portrayed and renders them clear. Hitler's presence was a unique and brief occurrence in Kubizek's life, and Hitler himself was such a curious character as to make it likely indeed that Kubizek should remember him well. In his recollection Hitler is an unusually ambivalent figure, his memoir is certainly no hagiography, and the traits he describes of his friend's character are fully in accordance with what emerges from other sources, only clearer, because no one before or since came as close to him as Kubizek did. The fact that Kubizek values Hitler greatly and sees him as if through a veil of admiration, does little to detract from what is a many-sided and nuanced portrait. The following description is typical:

> But although he was often brusque, moody, unreliable, and far from conciliatory, I could never be angry with him because these unpleasant sides of his character were overshadowed by the pure fire of an exalted soul.

Hitler vanished from Kubizek's life in the summer of 1908, and he neither saw him nor heard anything of him until 1933 when Hitler became Reich chancellor and Kubizek sent him a letter, a reply to which arrived some months later.

> My Dear Kubizek,
> Only today was your letter of 2 February placed before me. From the hundreds of thousands of letters I have received since January it is not surprising. All the greater was my joy, for the first time in so many years, to hear news of your life and to receive your address. I would very much like – when the time of my hardest struggles is over – to revive personally the memory of those most wonderful years of my life. Perhaps it would be possible for you to visit me. Wishing yourself and your mother all the best, I remain in the memory of our old friendship,
> Yours,
> Adolf Hitler

In 1938, during the so-called Anschluss, Hitler crosses the border of Austria at the town of his birth, Braunau on the Inn, thereby fulfilling the ambition he had set out at the beginning of Mein Kampf. This attention to the power of the symbolic was typical of him. That same evening he spoke from the balcony of the city hall in Linz. Kubizek was unable to attend, but when Hitler returned in April that same year Kubizek visited him at the Hotel Weinzinger. There was a huge crowd on the square outside, the guards took him for a madman when he asked to see the Reich chancellor, but after showing them the letter he was led into the foyer, where, he writes, the activity was like a beehive. Generals, ministers of state, Nazi Party bosses, and other uniformed officials came and went, all buzzing around one man, Adolf Hitler, now separated from Kubizek by a wall of power. He is told by a senior adjutant by the name of Albert Bormann that the Reich chancellor is feeling unwell and will not be receiving guests that evening, but that he should come back the following afternoon. The adjutant then invites him to take a seat for a moment so that he might ask him a few questions.

Had the Reich chancellor always slept in so late, he wishes to know. Hitler it seems never goes to bed before midnight and sleeps until well into the morning, while his entourage, who presumably have been required to stay up just as late, are obliged to be up bright and early the next day. The adjutant, brother of the more familiar Martin Bormann, goes on to complain about Hitler's outbursts of temper, which nobody could calm, and about his peculiar diet, vegetarian based on flour and plenty of fruit juices. Has he always been like that? Kubizek replies that indeed he has, except that he used to eat meat.

When he returns the next day the excitement and activity is unabated, the whole city has taken to the streets, he writes. He fights his way through the crowd and is led into the hotel foyer by some officials. He holds no illusions, expects nothing more than a brief handshake and a few warm words, and is nervous as to the form of address to use, fearing that any breach of protocol will send Hitler into a rage. But he is given an hour. Hitler appears in the corridor, recognizes him immediately, and cries out with joy, "It's you, Gustl!" and when he grasps Kubizek's hand with both of his and looks into his eyes, he is quite clearly as moved by the occasion as Kubizek himself. Hitler leads him to the elevator, which takes them up to his suite on the second floor.

> The personal adjutant opened the door; we entered and the adjutant left. Again, Hitler took my hand, gave me a long look and said, "You haven't changed, Kubizek. I would have recognized you anywhere. The only thing different is that you've got older." Then he led me to a table and offered me a chair. He assured > me how much pleasure it gave him to see me again after so many years. My good wishes had pleased him especially, for I knew better than anybody else how difficult his path had been. The present time was unfavorable for a long talk, but he hoped that there would be an opportunity in the future. He would contact me. To write to him directly was not advisable, for all his mail was dealt with by his aides.

> "I no longer have a private life and cannot do what I like as others can." With these words he rose and went to the window, which overlooked the Danube. The old bridge with its steel bars, which had so annoyed him in his youth, remained in use. As I expected, he mentioned it at once. "That ugly footbridge!" he cried. "It's still there. But not for much longer, I assure you, Kubizek." With that he turned and smiled. "All the same, I would love to take a stroll with you over the old bridge. But I can't, for wherever I go, everybody follows me. But believe me, Kubizek, for Linz I have many plans." Nobody knew that better than I. As expected, he drew forth from his memory all the plans which had occupied him in his youth just as though not thirty, but no more than three, years had passed since then.

After describing his plans for Linz in detail, Hitler questions Kubizek about his life, what he has become. The reply, Stadtamtsleiter, displeases him: "So, you are a civil servant, a clerk. That doesn't suit you. What did you make of your musical talents?" Kubizek tells him the war had thrown him off course and that in order not to starve he had to change horses. Hitler nods gravely. "Yes, the lost war." He looks at him, and adds, "You won't be ending your career as a municipal clerk, Kubizek." He asks him about the orchestra he runs, and enthuses, instructing him to make out a report detailing anything they might be short of and he will make sure they get what they need. He asks if he has any children. Kubizek tells him yes, three sons.

> "Three sons!" he cried emotionally. He repeated the words several times and with an earnest expression. "You have three sons, Kubizek. I have no family. I am alone. But I would like to help with your sons." He made me tell him everything > about them. He was delighted that all three were talented musically and two of them were skilled sketch artists.

> "I will sponsor the education of your three sons, Kubizek," he told me. "I don't like it when young, gifted people are forced to go along the same track that we did. You know how it was for us in Vienna. After that, for me, came the worst times of all, after our paths had separated. That young talent goes under because of need must not be allowed to happen. If I can help personally, I will, even if it's for your children, Kubizek!"
> I have to mention here that the Reich chancellor actually did have his office foot the bill for the musical education of my three sons at the Linz Bruckner-Conservatoire and on his orders the sketches of my son Rudolf were assessed by a professor at the Munich Academy.

Later they meet again, Hitler inviting him to the Wagner festival in Bayreuth in 1939 and 1940. The question is how reliable are the descriptions of these meetings and the picture of Hitler they provide? No one else was there, we have no other account to go by than Kubizek's own. One thing though is certain, the portrayal of Hitler is by no means opportunistic. Had Kubizek's book come out while the Nazis were still in power, in 1938 or 1942, for instance, the picture would have been different, there would have been grounds for suspicion, since any suggestion of anything negative or ambivalent in the portrait it paints of Hitler would have been impossible or at least highly precarious. But the book was published in 1953, and at that time the opposite held: the opportune thing to do then would have been to demonize Hitler, emphasize his negative aspects, whereas writing about his kindness, for instance, might be seen as an expression of Nazi sympathies, something not many people would wish to admit to after the war.

Kubizek was contacted by the Nazi Party in 1938 and asked to put his recollections of Hitler's youth on paper for the NSDAP archive. He joined the party in 1942, was to all intents and purposes ordered to write his memoirs by Martin Bormann, and in 1943 was given a better-paid position in order to complete the task. When the war ended, however, he had managed to write only some one hundred and fifty pages. He was arrested by the Americans because of his connections with Hitler and was interned for sixteen months under repeated interrogation. His manuscript and memorabilia remained hidden in his house, forming the basis of the book he eventually published in 1953, but the differences between the manuscript and the published work are nevertheless notable, Hamann writes. All passages expressing admiration for the Führer had been deleted, those describing their lives together in Linz and Vienna were retained. Some of the stories, such as Hitler's infatuation with Stefanie, have been expanded and reworked, many dates are incorrect, and in some places his memory fails him – for instance at one point he writes that their landlady in Vienna was Polish, whereas in actual fact she was Czech, and that they lodged at number 29 rather than number 31 – but otherwise everything that can be checked is correct. An exception is a number of episodes purporting to reveal Hitler's anti-Semitism, yet there would seem to be no evidence to support the suggestion that Hitler was an anti-Semite in his youth; on the contrary, his acquaintances in Vienna included several Jews and he expressed interest in Jewish culture. Mahler, whom he admired, was Jewish. The anti-Semitic episodes in Kubizek's book do not exist in the original manuscript, but were added in its later version. Hamann writes:

> Here Kubizek is clearly trying to promote himself. The Americans had questioned him exhaustively about his anti-Semitism, and now he is forced to maintain his line of defense. Thus he claims that Hitler had joined the Anti-Semitic League, filling out an appliction for him, Kubizek, as well, without his permission: "This was the high point of the kind of political violation which I had gradually got used to with him. I was all the more surprised since otherwise Adolf eagerly avoided joining any associations or organizations."
> However, before 1918 there was no Anti-Semitic League in Austro-Hungary. The Austrian anti-Semites were so at odds with one another, politically as well as ethnically, that an organization similar to the German Anti-Semitic League of 1884 never came about. Kubizek could have only joined the Austrian Anti-Semitic League, which was founded in 1919 – and voluntarily at > that, without Hitler's help. This issue is important because of all those early eyewitnesses who can be taken seriously, Kubizek is the only one to portray young Hitler as an anti-Semite, and precisely in this respect he is not trustworthy.

Another noticeable aspect that separates the two versions is that the first, completed during the Nazi period, is comparatively poorly written, while the second, published eight years after the war was over, is comparatively well written. Kershaw explains this by suggesting the second was ghostwritten, whereas Hamann points to "a skilled editor." Both however agree that the memoirs are the most important source of insight into Hitler's early years. And if it seems contrived that the circle should so neatly be closed with Hitler's return to Linz and his declaration that he will redesign the city according to the plans of his youth, it is nonetheless an incontrovertible fact that Hitler, in his final time in the bunker, with the world aflame above him and the Russians already well inside Berlin, only days before he shot himself, could sit for hours and ponder over a model of Linz built on his instructions by his architect Hermann Giesler and shown to all his visitors no matter the time of day or night. A bell tower one hundred and fifty meters tall with a mausoleum containing his parents' graves at its foot, a gigantic hotel for up to two thousand guests at a time, a music school called the Adolf Hitler School of Music, an opera house that was to be the biggest in the world, seating thirty-five thousand, were the most prominent buildings, according to Bengt Liljegren. Moreover, a technical university was planned, and a huge hundred-thousand capacity arena, housing areas for workers and artists, homes for SS and SA invalids, a railway station connecting to an underground transit system, access to the autobahn, and heavy industry, steelworks and chemical factories besides. The focal point of this new cityscape, in addition to the mausoleum with its bell tower, was to be a giant art museum. So determined was Hitler that his extensive art collection be donated to Linz that he explicitly mentions it in the will he draws up prior to his suicide, Liljegren writes. And throughout Hitler's entire period in power Linz was favored over Vienna. Hamann cites Goebbels's diary entry of May 17, 1941: "Linz costs us a lot of money. But it means so much to the Führer." This in contrast to Vienna, which during Hitler's years of government is given no priority whatsoever. Goebbels's diaries again, March 21, 1943: "The Führer doesn't have any particularly great plans for Vienna. On the contrary, Vienna has too much, and it might rather lose something than gain anything."

Hitler made it clear to Kubizek almost from the very outset of their friendship that he would live in Vienna. Linz was too small and provincial. To begin with he made a short trip there in May 1907 and enthused at what he saw. Back in Linz after this four-week sojourn in the capital, however, he is impossible to reach, withdrawn and silent, he wanders alone in the daytime and night in the city's environs, presumably in crisis at the prospect of uprooting, though it seems certain that it is his decision to make the move to Vienna that brings him back to normal again a couple of weeks later.

> The idea that he, a young man of eighteen, should continue to be kept by his mother had become unbearable to him. It was a painful dilemma which, as I could see for myself, made him almost physically ill. On the one hand, he loved his mother above everything: she was the only person on earth to whom he felt really close, and she reciprocated his feeling to some extent, although she was deeply disturbed by her son's unusual nature, however proud she was at times of him. "He is different from us," she used to say.
> On the other hand, she felt it to be her duty to carry out the wishes of her late husband, and to prevail on Adolf to embark on a safe career. But what was "safe," in view of the peculiar character of her son? He had failed at school and ignored all his mother's wishes and suggestions. A painter – that was what he had said he wanted to become. This could not seem very satisfactory to his mother for, simple soul that she was, anything connected with art and artists appeared to her frivolous and insecure.

Hitler's brother-in-law, Raubal, wants him to start working like any other young person, and tries to win Hitler's mother over. He finds Hitler spoiled, a manipulator who twists his mother around his little finger and needs to shape up and get a job, learn something decent. "This Pharisee is ruining my home for me," Hitler says of him. Raubal appeals to Frau Klara's reason, stepping into the role of her deceased husband. It is by no means difficult to imagine his arguments: Hitler sleeps late, earns no money, wanders around with his head in the clouds all day, she can't go on paying his way, he'll never learn to look after himself and his family otherwise, it's for his own good, surely you can see? Hitler's guardian, Mayrhofer, wants him to become a baker and has arranged an apprenticeship on his behalf. The other tenants in the building have their opinions too, Kubizek writes; none is in Hitler's favor. His mother despairs. For Hitler's own part, staying is out of the question, he has made up his mind, there is no alternative to Vienna and an artist's career there.

> He had come to hate the petit-bourgeois world in which he had to live. He could hardly bear to return to that narrow world after lonely hours spent in the open. He was always in a ferment of rage, hard and intractable.

The feeling of everyone being against him is not new in Hitler's life. But he and his mother are close – despite the pressures of others she can refuse him nothing. She is also ill. In January of that year the family physician, Dr. Bloch, discovers a lump in her breast. She undergoes surgery, and since the family has no health insurance, the bill, somehow settled by Hitler himself, then aged seventeen, must have been a considerable strain on their finances. She was in the hospital for a month; Hitler visited daily. After her release her frail condition meant she was no longer able to cope with the stairs and the family was forced to move. Their new apartment was on the ground floor of a building in the suburbs, owned by the woman who a few months later would write Hitler's letter of recommendation to Roller. Undeterred by the resistance of those closest to him, Hitler uproots to Vienna that same summer in order to become an artist.

Kubizek writes that Hitler came to see him the evening before his departure, asking him to see him off at the station, not wanting his mother to come.

> I knew how painful it would have been for Adolf to take leave of his mother in front of other people. He disliked nothing more than showing his feelings in public. I promised him to come and help him with his luggage.
> Next day I took time off and went to the Blütgengasse to collect my friend. Adolf had prepared everything. I took his suitcase, which was rather heavy with books he did not want to leave behind, and hurried away to avoid being present at the farewells. Yet I could not avoid them entirely. His mother was crying and little Paula, whom Adolf had never bothered with much, was sobbing in a heartrending manner. When Adolf caught up with me on the stairs and helped me with the suitcase, I saw that his eyes too were wet.

Hitler leaves for Vienna to seek admission to the Academy of Fine Arts; confident of his own talents he considers it a formality that he will be given a place. But he is turned down. In view of all the pressures at home, all those who held that his artist dreams were folly and who wished only that he would pull himself together and get himself a proper job, the rejection must have been crushing, and in fact he told no one. Neither Kubizek nor his own mother heard from him in those first weeks, not a word was sent, and a worried Kubizek went to see Frau Klara to find out if her son had been in touch. She offers him a chair and unburdens herself.

> "If only he had studied properly at the Realschule he would almost be ready to matriculate. But he won't listen to anybody." And she added, "He's as pigheaded as his father. Why this crazy journey to Vienna? Instead of holding on to his little legacy, it's just being frittered away. And after that? Nothing will come of his painting. And story writing doesn't earn anything either. And I can't help him – I've got Paula to look after. You know yourself what a sickly child she is but, just the same, she must get a decent education. Adolf doesn't give it a thought, he goes his way, just as if he were alone in the world. I shall not live to see him making an independent position for himself . . ."
> Frau Klara seemed more careworn than ever. Her face was deeply lined. Her eyes were lifeless, her voice sounded tired and resigned. I had the impression that, now that Adolf was no longer there, she had let herself go, and she looked older > and more ailing than ever. She certainly had concealed her condition from her son to make the parting easier for him.

Frau Hitler's condition deteriorates while her son is in Vienna: according to Hamann she visited the doctor once again on July 3, and again on September 2. Kubizek is busy; if not working in his father's workshop, he spends all his time practicing, so with Hitler's absence he does not return to visit Frau Klara until later that autumn. When he does he is shocked by what he sees. She is lying in bed, thin and pale, her face worn. Immediately she begins to talk of her son's letters, he seems to be doing well in Vienna. Kubizek asks if she has told Adolf how unwell she is. She has not, she does not wish to burden him, but if her condition fails to improve she will have to send for him. The doctor has advised her to go to the hospital and be admitted. Before leaving, Kubizek makes her promise to write to her son. When he gets home again he tells his parents. His mother immediately offers to help Frau Hitler, but his father thinks it bad manners to impose without being asked.

On October 22 in his office, Hamann writes, the doctor, Eduard Bloch, informs the family – Klara, Adolf, and his younger sister, Paula – that Frau Klara's illness is incurable. The next day Hitler appears at the upholstery workshop. Kubizek describes him as looking terrible. His face is so pale as to be almost transparent. His eyes are dull, his voice hoarse. Without a greeting, without word of what he has been up to in Vienna, and with no question about Stefanie, all he utters is, "Incurable, the doctor says."

> His eyes blazed, his temper flared up. "Incurable – what do they mean by that?" he screamed. "Not that the malady is incurable, but that the doctors aren't capable of curing it. My mother isn't even old. Forty-seven isn't an age where you give up hope. But as soon as the doctors can't do anything, they call it incurable."

He says he will stay in Linz and look after his mother and the housekeeping. Kubizek asks him if he can manage, knowing his friend's distaste for the necessary chores others have always carried out on his behalf, how disdainful he is of such monotonous work. Hitler replies that a person can do anything if they have to. For the next month he does exactly that. Not a word does he say about the issues on which he normally holds forth; politics, architecture, art, none of these things seems to occupy him any longer, only his ailing mother, close to death, and the grief of that. He moves her bed into the kitchen, the warmest room in the apartment, and sleeps on the couch next to her. He reads to her, cooks her food, helps his younger sister with her homework. One day Kubizek finds him scrubbing the floor, Frau Hitler smiles on seeing his surprise and says with pride, "There, you see, Adolf can do anything."

> I had never before seen in him such loving tenderness. I did not trust my own eyes and ears. Not a cross word, not an impatient remark, no violent insistence on having his own way. He forgot himself entirely in those weeks and lived only for his mother. Although Adolf, according to Frau Klara, had inherited many of his father's traits, I realized then how much his nature resembled his mother's. Certainly this was partly due to the fact that he had spent the previous four years of his life alone with her. But over and above that there was a peculiar spiritual harmony between mother and son which I have never since come across. All that separated them was pushed into the background. Adolf never mentioned the disappointment which he had suffered in Vienna. For the time being, cares for the future no longer seemed to exist. An atmosphere of relaxed, almost serene contentment surrounded the dying woman.

December is cold and bleak, a damp mist hangs over the river; the few hours in which the sun shines allow no warmth. Kubizek visits them daily; on one occasion he is not admitted, Hitler comes out instead and tells him his mother is suffering terrible pain. Snow falls, dusting the rooftops white, Christmas approaches. On the morning of the twenty-first of December, Hitler appears at the Kubizek home. From his distraught expression they realize what has happened. She has died, he tells them. Her final wish was to be buried next to her husband in Leonding. Hitler is beside himself and barely able to speak.

Kubizek writes nothing of the doctor's presence during the final weeks of Klara Hitler's life, yet according to Hamann he was there in daily attendance from November 6. He administered morphine and treated her with iodoform, a treatment "typical of the time and extremely painful" – cloths containing the substance were laid on the open wound to "burn it out," resulting in excruciating thirst and the simultaneous inability of the patient to swallow.

In 1941, Bloch published an article in Collier's magazine detailing the course of the illness and the circumstances surrounding it, in which he stated that Hitler was tormented by his mother's treatment and expressed gratitude to him for administering the morphine. Bloch's version confirms Kubizek's account.

> In the practice of my profession it is natural that I should have witnessed many scenes such as this one, yet none of them left me with quite the same impression. In all my career I have never seen anyone so prostrate with grief as Adolf Hitler.

Bloch also briefly described his general impression of Hitler:

> Many biographers have put him down as harsh-voiced, defiant, untidy; as a young ruffian who personified all that is unattractive. This simply is not true. As a youth he was quiet, well-mannered, and neatly dressed. He was tall, sallow, old for his age. He was neither robust nor sickly. Perhaps "frail-looking" would best describe him. His eyes – inherited from his mother – were large, melancholy, and thoughtful. To a very large extent this boy lived within himself. What dreams he dreamed I do not know.

On December 23, Kubizek and his mother visit Hitler's home. The weather has changed, the snow in the streets turned to slush, the air a mist. Frau Hitler is laid out in her bed, her face waxen, Kubizek writes that death must have come to her as a release from terrible pain. Paula, who is eleven years old, is crying, but not Hitler. Kubizek and his mother go down into the street. The body is placed in a coffin and brought down into the hall. The priest blesses the deceased and the small cortège begins its progress. Hitler follows the coffin, wearing a long black overcoat and black gloves, carrying a black top hat in his hand. He is stern and composed. To his left is his brother-in-law, Raubal, and between them Paula. His half sister, Angela, heavily pregnant, follows in a closed carriage. The rest of the cortège comprises only a few neighbors and acquaintances. Kubizek describes it as miserable.

The next day is Christmas Eve, Kubizek invites Hitler to spend it with his family, Hitler declines. Nor does he wish to join Raubal and his sister, who from now on are to look after Paula. Instead he wanders about the streets of Linz through the night, if what he later tells Kubizek is true.

Little mention is made of any of this in Mein Kampf. Of his mother's death and the circumstances surrounding it, Hitler writes as follows:

> It was the conclusion of a long and painful illness which from the beginning left little hope of recovery. Yet it was a dreadful blow, particularly for me. I had honored my father, but my mother I had loved.
> Poverty and hard reality now compelled me to take a quick decision. What little my father had left had been largely exhausted by my mother's grave illness; the orphan's pension to which I was entitled was not enough for me even to live on, and so I was faced with the problem of somehow making my own living.
> In my hand a suitcase full of clothes and underwear; in my heart an indomitable will, I journeyed to Vienna. I, too, hoped to wrest from Fate what my father had accomplished fifty years before; I, too, wanted to become "something" – but on no account a civil servant.

The little "but" in the sentence concerning his mother and father, "but my mother I had loved," more than suggests that he did not love his father, and by dwelling so little on his mother's death and immediately directing the text toward the future, and so optimistically, in such a way as to close the circle of what, if Mein Kampf is to be believed, has been the predominant and governing conflict in his life so far, his refusal to become a civil servant, he gives the impression that the grief of losing his mother was transient, an impression reinforced by the fact that she is hardly mentioned at all in the text and that the two years they spent together are passed over in a single sentence. This gives a sense of vigor and drive, a new beginning, pockets empty, his own devices being his only resource. In the chapter that follows he goes back in time, writing:

> When my mother died, Fate, at least in one respect, had made its decisions.
> In the last months of her sickness, I had gone to Vienna to take the entrance examination for the Academy. I had set out with a pile of drawings, convinced that it would be child's play to pass the examination. At the Realschule I had been by far the best in my class at drawing, and since then my ability had developed amazingly; my own satisfaction caused me to take a joyful pride in hoping for the best.

He gets through the first part of the exam, but fails the remainder. "I was so convinced that I would be successful that when I received my rejection, it struck me as a bolt from the blue. Yet that is what happened."

This happens before the death of his mother, and since he has already described that event, and the previous chapter concludes with his moving to Vienna, his rejection by the Academy is tacked on to the description of his arrival in Vienna following his mother's death, meaning that the rejection and his mother's death are reported in reverse order and separated. This gives the impression that while his mother's death was a blow it was also a release in that it brought with it a sense of future, though in real life it must have seemed quite different: his mother is gravely ill, he leaves for Vienna to take his entrance exam, fails, his dream thereby in ruins, and with that failure he returns home to his mother, who then dies. In this there is no future, but quite the opposite, his life closes in on him. She was the very center of his existence, and he of hers. His mother's condition deteriorates, he returns from Vienna, they both know she is dying, she is concerned as to his future, and he never tells her he failed the entrance exam to the Academy.

The first eighteen years of Hitler's life are described in only fourteen pages of Mein Kampf, and the narrative is furthermore dotted with reflections on nationalism, history, and his own theories on a number of subjects. The period in which he lived in Vienna, the five years from 1908 to 1913, takes up all of ninety-eight pages. But there is hardly a sentence that touches on his personal life, and what little he writes in this respect is general in nature.

> To me Vienna, the city which, to so many, is the epitome of innocent pleasure, a festive playground for merrymakers, represents, I am sorry to say, merely the living memory of the saddest period of my life.
> Even today this city can arouse in me nothing but the most dismal thoughts. For me the name of this Phaeacian city represents five years of hardship and misery. Five years in which I was forced to earn a living, first as a day laborer, then as a smaller painter; a truly meager living which never sufficed to appease even my daily hunger. Hunger was then my faithful bodyguard; he never left me for a moment and partook of all I had, share and share alike. Every book I acquired aroused his interest; a visit to the Opera prompted his attentions for days at a time; my life was a continuous struggle with this pitiless friend. And yet during this time I studied as never before. Aside from my architecture and my rare visits to the Opera, paid for in hunger, I had but one pleasure: my books.
> At that time I read enormously and thoroughly. All the free time my work left me was employed in my studies. In this way I forged in a few years' time the foundation of a knowledge from which I still draw nourishment today.

Nothing of this is untrue. He was poor, often hungry, and eked out a living painting for tourists or frame makers, a "meager" time indeed. In Mein Kampf he makes this out to be a necessary apprenticeship, a time in which, from his lowly position in society, he learned what it meant to be poor, what it meant to live in social misery, experiencing firsthand the dissolution of shared values and the collapse of the Habsburg Empire. He presents himself as a manual laborer, describing how he involves himself in workers' politics, the violence and the suppression of opinion that occurs at society's lower levels, and he puts forward his visions of how all this may and ought to be dealt with. He tells of his visits to the parliament, giving rise to his disdain for parliamentarism and democracy. And he describes his first encounters with Jews, not personal but in the form of strange figures he sees on the streets. He gives a picture of a world disintegrating on all levels and in every imaginable way. Everything he experienced, even the misery in which he lived, is in this way given meaning: he observes, perceives, reads, thinks, and though his circumstances are poor, his life at this time is a school he would not have wished to have done without. He has entered the school of life, nothing of what he can do comes from any university, nothing of what he takes in and writes about is down to any theory, but is alone the result of practical reality.

The pride in this account hides how badly he wants to enter the Academy and is clearly a rationalization after the fact. Everything points forward to the person he is now. But if we are to understand the kind of life he led in those five years, all Hitler's future must be discarded. Nothing of what he did then pointed toward anything else. The misery into which he gradually sank was indeed misery. He was seen standing in line at a soup kitchen for the homeless; everything indicates he slept in the parks for a time. He had no friends, hardly any acquaintances, and what little social contact he had consisted of the fellow destitutes he encountered at a flophouse. Moreover, the five years he spent living in this way are perhaps the most crucial of all in a person's life, those between the ages of eighteen and twenty-three. Hitler was destitute, nothing of what he had believed in had turned out to be right, his dreams had fallen short, he was a person no one wanted and no one needed. He had lost his grip on reality, had practically no footing at all in the real world. If he had frozen to death in the night, no one would have cared. He was, in every sense, a nonentity, vanished into total anonymity, in the very gutter of society.

Yet it began in a different place altogether. It began well. Arriving in Vienna he had with him his mother's money, enough to keep him going for a year providing he was thrifty. He could reapply to the Academy. And he was not alone in the big city, Kubizek came with him.

In his Hitler biography Ian Kershaw provides this depiction:

> When he did return to Vienna, in February 1908, it was not to pursue with all vigor the necessary course of action to become an architect, but to slide back into the life of indolence, idleness, and self-indulgence which he had followed before his mother's death. He even now worked on Kubizek's parents until they reluctantly agreed to let August leave his work in the family upholstery business to join him in Vienna in order to study music.

Kubizek himself was for the rest of his life grateful that Hitler had talked his parents into allowing him to pursue his desire to study music. Self-indulgence was undoubtedly one of Hitler's most prominent traits, yet it was this very eruptive, near-manic side of him too that meant he would throw himself with great abandon and urgency into whatever subject or issue might capture his imagination at a given time, this often being followed by periods of despondency, though such moods too could be quite as restless and insistent. What Kershaw is perhaps alluding to is that this urgency was never directed, would never follow any plotted course or plan. While Hitler's relatives most likely would have endorsed the description of him giving himself up to "indolence, idleness, and self-indulgence," Hitler himself must certainly have seen things differently, there was something he wanted to become, something never quite within reach, that never quite turned out, which of course is by no means unusual for a young man of eighteen years old with ambitions of becoming an artist. Hitler was in every respect an autodidact, and like so many of his kind he became gradually more opinionated, a development exacerbated by his essentially solitary nature, inclined never to seek the company of others; he had a favorite bench in one of Vienna's parks, slightly out of the way, where he would sit and read whenever he was not seated at one of the city's many cafés poring through the newspapers, or else immersed in one of his many projects in his lodgings, whether drawing up plans for apartment buildings, opera houses, and concert halls, or writing plays and short stories – these all being matters to which he devoted himself during this time, all abandoned before completion, all witnessed by Kubizek, who lived by his side.

Kubizek arrives at the railway station in Vienna late one evening in winter. Hitler is waiting for him, elegantly clad, the ivory-handled walking stick in his hand, seemingly acclimatized and at ease with the hustle and bustle, already the city dweller. Hitler kisses him lightly on the cheek in greeting, they take a handle each of Kubizek's heavy bag and head out into the city, "such a terrible noise that one could not hear oneself speak," Adolf eventually leading them down a side street, Stumpergasse, to his rented room in a rear courtyard building.

> In the small room that he occupied, a miserable paraffin lamp was burning. I looked around me. The first thing that struck me were the sketches that lay around on the table, on the bed, everywhere. Adolf cleared the table, spread a piece of newspaper on it, and fetched a bottle of milk from the window. Then he brought sausage and bread. But I can still see his white, earnest face as I pushed all these things aside and opened the bag. Cold roast pork, stuffed buns, and other lovely things to eat. All he said was, "Yes, that's what it is to have a mother!" We ate like kings. Everything tasted of home.

Kubizek is tired after his journey, his senses already bombarded, the hour is late, but still Hitler insists on showing him the city. How could someone just arriving in Vienna go to bed without first having seen the opera house? They go out. Kubizek writes that it feels as though he has been transported to another planet, so overwhelming is the impression. They proceed to the Stefansdom. The evening mist is so dense they cannot see the spire: "I could just make out the heavy, dark mass of the nave stretching up into the gray monotony of the mist, almost unearthly, as though not built by human hands."

Kershaw describes the same events as follows:

> Adolf met a tired Kubizek at the station that evening, took him back to Stumpergasse to stay the first night, but, typically, insisted on immediately showing him all the sights of Vienna. How could someone come to Vienna and go to bed without first seeing the Court Opera House? So Gustl was dragged off > to view the opera building, Saint Stephen's Cathedral (which could scarcely be seen through the mist), and the lovely church of Saint Maria am Gestade. It was after midnight when they returned to Stumpergasse, and later still when an exhausted Kubizek fell asleep with Hitler still haranguing him about the grandeur of Vienna.

Kershaw's only source as to this evening is Kubizek's book, which says nothing of Hitler "haranguing" him, and the sense, on seeing the opera, of having been transported to another planet, and of the cathedral appearing unearthly in the mist, as Kubizek writes, charging the experience with positive energy, is ignored by Kershaw; in his version the mist is negative, making the spire scarcely visible, and this is so in order to make Hitler out to be an unreasonable, self-indulgent, and egotistical young man oblivious to the needs of his friend. But if this had been the case, if the experience had been unambiguously negative, why does Kubizek not say so? Kubizek is a friend, his arrival has been greatly anticipated, Hitler is eager to show him all the things he has seen himself, all that is marvelous about the city, and can anyone blame him for that? How can we say that Hitler's enthusiasm was in fact disregard for his friend, when at the same time his friend has described what happened as a positive experience? Was Kubizek duped? Was he too stupid to realize that Hitler was using him? Did he not understand that viewing a cathedral in the mist is a washout, not an unearthly experience?

Or, conversely, on what basis does Kershaw overrule the account of his only source with a version of what in fact happened?

The issue with biography as a genre, and this is as true of autobiography as it is of the memoir, is that the author purports to be omniscient, a sole authority, he or she knows how it all turned out, and as such it is almost impossible not to accord emphasis to any sign, be it character trait or event, that points in that one direction, even if, as in this instance, it is merely one trait, one event among many others that in no way called attention to themselves. Of course, the truth of any past situation is elusive, it belongs to the moment and cannot be separated from it, but we may ensnare that moment, illuminate it from different angles, weigh the plausibility of one interpretation against that of another, and in that experiment endeavor to ignore what later happened, which is to say refrain from considering one character trait, one event, as a sign of something other than what it is in itself.

This "in itself" is both riddle and solution at the same time. If we view Hitler as a "bad" person, with categorically negative characteristics even as a child and a young man, all pointing toward a subsequently escalating "evil," then Hitler is of "the other," and thereby not of us, and in that case we have a problem, since then we are unburdened of the atrocities he and Germany later committed, these being something "they" did, so no longer a threat to us. But what is this "bad" that we do not embody? What is this "evil" that we do not express? The very formulation is indicative of how we humans think in terms of categories, and of course there is nothing wrong with that as long as we are aware of the dangers. In the night of pathology and the predetermined there is no free will, and without free will there is no guilt.

No matter how broken a person might be, no matter how disturbed the soul, that person remains a person always, with the freedom to choose. It is choice that makes us human. Only choice gives meaning to the concept of guilt.

Kershaw and almost two generations with him have condemned Hitler and his entire being as if pointing to his innocence when he was nineteen or twenty-three, or pointing to some of the good qualities he retained throughout his life, were a defense of him and of evil. In actual fact the opposite is true: only his innocence can bring his guilt into relief.

The day after Kubizek's arrival in Vienna the two friends begin their hunt for a room he can rent. The task is a difficult one, most rooms being too small for the piano he needs, and when they do find one big enough the landlady refuses to hear of having a lodger practice such an instrument. Kubizek's impression of Vienna is not good, the city seems to him full of indifferent, unsympathetic people, gloomy courtyards, narrow, ill-lit tenements and stairs. Despairing and miserable, he happens on another "room-to-rent" notice in the Zollergasse; they ring the bell and a maid opens the door and shows them into an elegantly furnished room containing magnificent twin beds.

> "Madame is coming immediately," said the maid, curtsied, and vanished. We both knew at once that it was too stylish for us. Then "madame" appeared in a doorway, very much a lady, not so young, but very elegant.
> She wore a silk dressing gown and slippers trimmed with fur. She greeted us smilingly, inspected Adolf, then me, and asked us to sit down. My friend asked which room was to let. "This one," she answered, and pointed to the two beds. Adolf shook his head and said curtly, "Then one of the beds must come out, because my friend must have room for a piano." The lady was obviously disappointed that it was I and not Adolf who wanted a room, and asked whether Adolf already had lodgings. When he answered in the affirmative she suggested that I, together with the piano I needed, should move into his room and he should take this one. While she was suggesting this to Adolf with some animation, through a sudden movement the belt which kept the dressing gown together came undone. "Oh, excuse me, gentlemen," the lady exclaimed, and immediately refastened the dressing gown. But that second had sufficed to show us that under her silk covering she wore nothing but a brief pair of knickers.
> Adolf turned as red as a peony, gripped my arm, and said, "Come, Gustl!" I do not remember how we got out of the house. All I remember is Adolf's furious exclamation as we arrived back in the street. "What a Frau Potiphar!" Apparently such experiences were also part of Vienna.

These are a pair of inexperienced young men from the sticks; the man of the world he thought Hitler was vanishes in the blushing cheeks that also give us a picture of Hitler's chastity and fear of women. He is eighteen years old and utterly unversed, Kubizek tells us there were no women in Hitler's life in the four years they spent together and he did not masturbate. This latter point is of course impossible to verify, yet it fits well with what we know of Hitler's sexuality from Mein Kampf and various other sources. Womanhood was associated with purity and exalted, a part of the ideal world he so cultivated, and his later romantic relationships were all with very young and innocent women. His obsession with purity and the way that obsession also pertained to sexual matters reveals itself in several episodes in Kubizek's book. On one occasion, after they had been to a performance of a play the press had made infamous for its supposedly immoral nature, Hitler takes Kubizek by the arm and leads him to the red-light district so that he might see with his own eyes how depraved and morally corrupted humanity has become. The prostitutes sit in illuminated rooms in low, one-story houses along the street, men amble back and forth, stopping to conduct whispered interchanges with the girl of their choice, after which the light inside would be put out. Hitler and Kubizek pass down the length of the street, but as they reach the end Hitler turns to go back. "Sink of iniquity" is a recurring phrase, and when Kubizek suggests that seeing it once is enough, Hitler drags him back past the windows with him. The prostitutes try to win their attention, one rolls down her stockings and shows her bare legs as they pass, another casually takes off her chemise as if to change, and as soon as they are out of the area Hitler rages against their "tricks of seduction." Back home in his room in the Stumpergasse he proceeds to hold forth and deliver a lecture on these new impressions and what they mean. Now, he declares, he has learned the customs of the market for commercial love and the purpose of his visit has thereby been fulfilled.

The episode makes plain three of the young Hitler's various modes of relating to the world around him: at first he is within it, filled with unmanageable feelings of attraction and disgust, lust and shame; then he rages against it, eventually, at due distance, to analyze it. Analysis is the preferred mode, and the remoteness it requires is one of the most striking elements of Hitler's character and cannot be underestimated.

Hitler and Kubizek live in the middle of one of the world's biggest cities, they are eighteen years old, and Hitler at least is completely free in the sense that both his parents are dead, he has no family to tie him down, and in principle he can do whatever he wants. The possibilities are many, the world stands open. Yet he associates with no one, does not so much as look at a woman, takes no part in the life that is going on around him. The seriousness with which he approaches life is immense, he has only disdain for anyone having fun, enjoying oneself is superficial and in some way beneath him. He sees much hardship and misery in his surroundings and possesses a strong sense of social indignation, he speaks often of the little man and of poverty; at one point he makes an excursion into the poorest district so that he might know what he is talking about, but the poor themselves, the people who live in such poverty, are anathema to him, he ignores them, will not speak to them or even be close to them, his dislike of contact is immense and conspicuous. The same applies to women, he can speak of them, idealize them, or consider them depraved, but he cannot have them close to him, expressing relief that women have no access to the area where he and Kubizek usually stand at the opera.

The strict morals he champions and according to which he conducts his life, these harsh rules he follows in all their rejection of the physical body, would clearly seem to be a way of controlling his inner self, which by all accounts is chaotic in the extreme. And since the outside world too is chaotic, which is to say complex and expanding in every way, as the city and culture were in the first decade of the twentieth century, marked by rampant poverty, political chaos, prostitution and sexual liberation – it has to be remembered that Freud was living and writing in the same city, and that Gustav Klimt was painting there too – it is hardly surprising that he should apply to society the same rules he has applied to himself, rules of abstinence and control, the two things, individual and society, meeting and leveling out in the emotions, which in his case are powerful. The contempt of his "Frau Potiphar!" or "tricks of seduction" stem clearly from emotions thereby occasioned inside him, lust and disgust, perhaps, and applied to society as a whole, the "sink of iniquity." He is manically obsessed with cleanliness and a well-groomed appearance, dressing always as neatly as possible, another way of controlling his inner chaos. And this must be why he is so interested in art, it affords him peace in which to devote himself to something else, something grand and beautiful and majestic.

> When he listened to Wagner's music he was a changed man: his violence left him, he became quiet, yielding, and tractable. His gaze lost its restlessness; his own destiny, however heavily it may have weighed upon him, became unimportant. He no longer felt lonely and outlawed, misjudged by society.

These emotions that so uplift him are his too, they belong not to the music, not to Wagner, but to him, and the feeling of being elevated by the music and language of the stage, of being permeated by the exquisite, is so important to him that he even forgoes eating so as to have money to buy opera tickets.

His immense energy, construed by Kershaw as indolence insofar as it exists outside any academic framework or meaningful enterprise whatsoever, is hard not to read into the same pattern, for when he is most deeply immersed in a project, he vanishes completely, and the only thing that exists is his urgent industry: his thoughts, plans, and sketches. His behavior is eruptive, obsessive, on the threshold of normal. Indeed, if Hitler's personal morals and those he applies to society at this time are strongly constraining, his artistic industry is quite without boundary. There are simply no limits to what he will apply himself to, nothing can stand in his way, everything is wide open. "It is not the professor's wisdom that counts," he says to Kubizek, "but genius," and begins promptly to compose an opera. He can play no instrument, has no knowledge of harmony or orchestration, and yet he pushes such limitations aside as technicalities, striving to delve into his fiercest emotions and express them in the language he admires most of all. He experiments with an ill-fated system attempting to combine sound and color, works out a prelude and asks for Kubizek's opinion of it. Kubizek tells him the basic themes are good, but that he has to realize that on such a basis alone it will be impossible to write an opera, at the same time declaring his readiness to teach him the necessary theory. "Do you think I'm mad?" Hitler shouts at him. "What have I got you for? First of all you will put down exactly what I play on the piano."

They proceed accordingly. Kubizek tries to make it clear to him that he must keep to one key. "Who is the composer, you or I?" Hitler rants back. Eventually he decides that the opera, based on a legend of Germanic mythology, should be performed in the musical mode of expression pertaining to the period in question. He asks Kubizek if anything remains preserved of Germanic music. Kubizek tells him there is nothing save for a few instruments, drums, bone flutes, and horns. Hitler reminds him that the skalds had sung to the accompaniment of harp-like instruments and proposes they do likewise. To make the thing tolerable for the human ear, as he puts it, Kubizek talks him out of the idea. Reverting to more conventional instrumentation they forge ahead, however slowly. Hitler designs the scenery and costumes in detail and pens the libretto. He eats nothing, goes without sleep, hardly drinks. Throughout, he demands that Kubizek not only be party to the process, but quite as devoted as he is, and berates him repeatedly. Hitler is the roommate from hell.

> It would have been easy for me to take as an excuse one of our frequent quarrels to move out. The people at the Conservatoire would have been only too pleased to help me find another room. Why did I not do it? After all, I had often admitted to myself that this strange friendship was no good for my studies. How much time and energy did I lose in these nocturnal activities with my friend? Why, then, did I not go? Because I was homesick, certainly, and because Adolf represented for me a bit of home. But, after all, homesickness is something a young man of twenty can overcome. What was it then? What held me?
> Frankly it was just hours like those through which I was now living which bound me even more closely to my friend. I knew the normal interests of young people of my age: flirtations, shallow pleasures, idle play, and a lot of unimportant, meaningless thoughts. Adolf was the exact opposite. There was an incredible earnestness in him, a thoroughness, a true passionate interest in everything that happened and, most important, an unfailing devotion to the beauty, majesty, and grandeur of art. It was this that attracted me especially to him and restored my equilibrium after hours of exhaustion.

Like so many of Hitler's projects, his opera comes to nothing. He is far too restless and has far too little patience to see such a demanding enterprise through to completion, and furthermore we can assume that his frustrations at his own musical shortcomings must eventually have wearied him.

Other projects on which he embarked in this period included a grand attempt at solving the housing crisis in Vienna, a task that involved him redesigning the entire city as well as meticulously drawing plans for the new workers' units he envisaged. Another idea was that the music he so cherished should be taken to those living outside the city, a "mobile Reichs-Orchestra" whose organization and repertoire he planned down to the smallest detail, even the color of the orchestra members' shirts, Kubizek recalls. All these projects were pipe dreams, remote from reality and basically meaningless, yet they tell us a lot about Hitler's character, the way he could dedicate himself, the boundless belief in his own abilities and the way he thereby found out how he might connect his internal and external existences without having to pass through the social domain he seemingly either feared or loathed, and which, regardless of all else, always broke down his inner dreams by confronting them with external reality, presenting to him, in other words, their real-world consequences. Our internal existence is abstract, external reality tangible, and in these grand yet unrealistic designs the two aspects collide in a way he is unable to manage.

Kubizek and Hitler lived together in Vienna for five months over the spring and summer of 1908. Hitler never let on that he had been turned down by the Academy, and he led his life in such a way as to make his friend believe he had been accepted and attended its lessons. They shared a room; after the incident with Frau Potiphar they had decided it was convenient. Hitler made inquiries with his landlady, Frau Zakreys, who agreed to move into Hitler's old room, while the two friends moved into hers. Kubizek took the conservatory's entrance exam the following day. He passed and was admitted, but Hitler seemed anything but pleased on his behalf. "I had no idea I had such a clever friend," he remarks baldly. He was often irritable during this period, and Kubizek considers this the reason he does not wish to hear about his studies. Kubizek is puzzled by a number of aspects of his friend's behavior, among them the fact that he spends so little time painting, devoting his attention to any number of other things instead; he writes a play, he reads books that have nothing to do with painting. Kubizek clearly senses that all is not well, but he is used to Hitler's obstinacy and eccentric manner and puts it down to that, besides him having only recently lost his mother.

> His mood worried me more and more as the days went by. I had never known him to torment himself in this way before, far from it. In my opinion, he possessed rather too much than too little self-confidence. But now things seemed to have changed round. He wallowed deeper and deeper in self-criticism. Yet it only needed the lightest touch – as when one flicks on the light and everything becomes brilliantly clear – for his self-accusation to become an accusation against the times, against the whole world. Choking with his catalog of hates, he would pour his fury over everything, against mankind in general who did not understand him, who did not appreciate him and by whom he was persecuted. I see him before me, striding up and down the small space in boundless anger, shaken to his very depths. I sat at the piano with my fingers motionless on the keyboard and listened to him, upset by his hymn of hate, and yet worried about him.

They argue a lot in these first weeks about how to arrange themselves in the apartment; Kubizek wants to practice, Hitler wants to read; when poor weather forces them both to stay in, the mood can be tense. At one point Kubizek fixes his schedule to the cupboard door with a thumbtack and asks Hitler to do likewise so they can see when the other one is going to be out. But Hitler has no schedule, he doesn't need one, he says, he keeps it all in his head. Kubizek shrugs his shoulders, unconvinced. Hitler's work is anything but systematic, mostly he works at night and sleeps until late in the mornings. To see his friend doing so well cannot have been easy for Hitler. And now, with the schedule on the cupboard door a clear and visible symbol of his friend's progress, he explodes with rage.

> "This Academy," he screamed, "is a lot of old-fashioned fossilized civil servants, bureaucrats devoid of understanding, stupid lumps of officials. The whole > Academy ought to be blown up!" His face was livid, the mouth quite small, the lips almost white. But the eyes glittered. There was something sinister about them, as if all the hate of which he was capable lay in those glowing eyes! I was just going to point out that those men of the Academy on whom he so lightly passed judgment in his measureless hatred were, after all, his teachers and professors, from whom he could certainly learn something, but he forestalled me: "They rejected me, they threw me out, they turned me down."

> I was shocked. So that was it. Adolf did not go to the Academy at all. Now I could understand a great deal that had puzzled me about him. I felt his hard luck deeply, and asked him whether he had told his mother that the Academy had not accepted him. "What are you thinking of?" he replied. "How could I burden my dying mother with this worry?"
> I could not help but agree. For a while we were both silent. Perhaps Adolf was thinking of his mother. Then I tried to give the conversation a practical turn. "And what now?" I asked him.
> "What now, what now," he repeated irritably. "Are you starting too – what now?" He must have asked himself this question a hundred times and more, because he had certainly not discussed it with anyone else. "What now?" he mocked my anxious inquiry again, and instead of answering, sat himself down at the table and surrounded himself with his books. "What now?"
> He adjusted the lamp, took up a book, opened it, and began to read. I made to take the schedule down from the cupboard door. He raised his head, saw it, and said calmly, "Never mind."

That Hitler can construct and live such a lie instead of admitting to his friend that he has failed must surely have been a great strain on his life and tells us something about his ability to deny the real world in favor of illusion, but most of all it is revealing of his pride. Their friendship is based on Hitler talking and Kubizek listening, Hitler acting and Kubizek tagging along, in short Hitler dominating and Kubizek submitting. During that spring a fundamental shift occurs in this power structure, for not only does Kubizek gain admittance to the music conservatory, with Hitler having failed the entrance exam to the Academy, he also makes great strides in his studies. Soon he is entrusted with teaching, and as part of the conservatory's end-of-term festivities he conducts the first-night concert, with three songs of his own composition being performed on the second night as well as two movements from his sextet for strings. Hitler is in attendance and witnesses the congratulations Kubizek receives from his professors and even from the director of the conservatory. Hitler is enthusiastic and proud, though, as Kubizek writes, one can well imagine "what he was thinking in his heart of hearts." His friend's success throws his own failure emphatically into relief. And while he may still dominate him when they are on their own together and appear totally superior, when things are boiled down, the fact of the matter is that he is outshone and overlooked.

Summer arrives, and they have been living together for five months; Kubizek returns to his parents in Linz for the holidays, after which he is to undergo eight weeks of training in the Austro-Hungarian army reserve before coming back to Vienna to continue his studies. Hitler remains in the apartment, having no money to travel anywhere and no one to visit. He sends Kubizek postcards and letters while his friend is away, all is fine, and in the main he is occupied by the building projects going on in Linz and wants Kubizek to keep him informed as to their progress. Kubizek does as he asks while putting in hours in his father's workshop, sending his share of the rent to their landlady in Vienna; he departs for his military training and writes to Hitler announcing his arrival back in Vienna so that his friend might meet him and lend a hand with his luggage. By then it is November.

> I had, as I had written to him, taken the early train to save time, and arrived at the Westbahnhof at three o'clock in the afternoon. He would be waiting, I thought, at the usual spot, the ticket barrier. Then he could help me carry the heavy case which also contained something for him from my mother. Had I missed him? I went back again, but he was certainly not at the barrier. I went into the waiting room. In vain I looked around me: Adolf was not there. Perhaps he was ill. He had indeed written me in his last letter that he was still > being plagued by his old trouble, bronchial catarrh. I put my case in the left-luggage office and, very worried, hastened to the Stumpergasse. Frau Zakreys was delighted to see me, but told me immediately that the room was taken. "But Adolf, my friend?" I asked her astonished.

> From her lined, withered face Frau Zakreys stared at me with wide-open eyes. "But don't you know that Herr Hitler has moved out?"
> No, I did not know.
> "Where has he moved to?" I asked.
> "Herr Hitler didn't tell me that."
> "But he must have left a message for me – a letter, perhaps, or a note. How else shall I get hold of him?"
> The landlady shook her head. "No, Herr Hitler didn't leave anything."
> "Not even a greeting?"
> "He didn't say anything."

Thirty years would pass before Kubizek again laid eyes on Hitler. He had vanished and did not wish to be found. Had he wanted to keep in touch, Kubizek reasons, Hitler would have asked for his address from their former landlady, his parents in Linz, or the music conservatory. He never did, so there was no doubt he wanted to be left alone. Kubizek looked up his half sister the next time he was in Linz, but she knew nothing of his whereabouts or what he might be up to.

There are many conceivable reasons why Hitler would take such a drastic step as to sever all contact with the only person in his life. The most obvious of these is pride: while Kubizek was undergoing his military training in September Hitler had again taken the Academy's entrance exam and had once again failed; this time he was rejected after the first round. From what Kubizek tells us of his character and nature it would not be unreasonable to assume that his failure this time was too great for him to be able to tell Kubizek. Another reason has also to do with pride; after a year in Vienna punctuated by the death of his mother, his funds were beginning to run out, he could no longer afford to keep up the room in the Stumpergasse, nor did there seem any likelihood of him earning money without degrading himself by taking on what he so disdainfully referred to as "bread-and-butter" work; another loss of prestige in relation to Kubizek. Another reason still was that Kubizek represented his only contact with Linz and Hitler's family there; through Kubizek's parents they could easily find out where Kubizek – and therefore Hitler himself – was living. By vanishing the way he did, all ties to his family, which is to say the family of his half sister, were broken.

With Kubizek out of the picture we know little about Hitler's life in the year that followed. This is telling indeed, given that his life as a whole is one of the century's most thoroughly charted and dissected. From the public records we know he moved out of the Stumpergasse into cheaper lodgings not far away in the Felberstrasse. The form required by the local police authority states his profession as "student" – on his arrival in Vienna he had registered as an "artist." He remained in the Felberstrasse for a year until the following summer. What he did during that time is not known. The only existing information tells us he canceled his membership in the museum association in Linz on March 4, presumably in order to save the cost of the subscription. In August 1909, after a year, he moves to even cheaper accommodation, a room on the outskirts in the Sechshauserstrasse, where he registers himself as a "Schriftsteller," or "writer." He lives there no more than three weeks before moving out again, at which point all trace of him is lost. On the registration form a hand has written "moved, no known address." Everything points to him now being homeless, sleeping out through the autumn and winter. It was not possible to rent a room without registering with the police, and even though everything relating to Hitler was removed by the Nazis from the Austrian archives following the Anschluss, the documents were not destroyed but kept in the archives of the NSDAP, and tell us nothing. Another indication that he now lived on the streets consists of a sighting of him, the only one reported during this time, by a relative of his first landlady, Frau Zakreys, who recognized him standing in line at a soup kitchen for the destitute: "His clothes looked very shabby and I felt sorry for him, because he used to be so well dressed."

The next time he appears in police archives is in December 1909, when he found his way to a flophouse in Meidling. There he made the acquaintance of a tramp, Reinhold Hanisch, a man with a police record for a variety of misdemeanors including fraud and theft. Later, Hanisch would publish a memoir, in which he writes that Hitler, then twenty years old, looked in a sorry state, depressed, tired and hungry, and with sore feet. His blue-checked suit had turned purple due to rain and the disinfectant with which anyone staying at the hostel was obliged to delouse their clothing. He had no possessions, presumably having sold everything he had brought with him from Linz. According to Hamann, Hitler told Hanisch he had been thrown out by his landlady, that he had sat around in all-night cafés the first few nights until his money ran out, and that since then he had been sleeping on park benches. He had not eaten for some days and told of approaching a drunken gentleman one night and begging him for money, only for the man to hurl insults at him. Hanisch shared some bread with him and put him in the know as to where to get free soup and medical attention.

This is not the Vienna in which Stefan Zweig and Ludwig Wittgenstein grew up; and if Hitler belonged to the lower social strata when renting his room in the Stumpergasse with Kubizek, he had now definitively fallen through the floor into the gutter. This was rock bottom. He has no work, nowhere to live, no money, no food, no friends, barely an acquaintance. He owns nothing, his clothes are shabby, he is cold and he is hungry. That he should be indolent, a layabout, as Kershaw suggests, accords poorly with the fact that he remains in Vienna. To be indolent is to choose convenience, to be indolent is to proceed by the easiest route. The life he is now living, at a minimum level of existence, depending on the charity of others, is no convenient life, but the most strenuous life imaginable. Knowing as we do that Hitler had offers of work at the time of his leaving Linz, from one of his former neighbors and from his guardian, that he had relatives in the countryside whom he visited in the summer with his mother, and that his brother-in-law was a state official in a secure tenure, with whom he almost certainly would have been able to stay for a period of time if only he would bow his head in humility, the fact that we now find him here, in such extreme destitution, indicates the opposite of convenience and indolence, it is a life far from that of the layabout. His rejection of bourgeois existence is no convenient rejection, but an absolute rejection, a "no" for which he is prepared to pay quite a high price.

One must ask oneself why. What was it he wanted? He has sought admittance to the Academy of Fine Arts, not once but twice, John Toland suggests three times, that he reapplied in September of that year, but the fact remains that he has his whole life set on it. "Artist," he calls himself when registering as tenant of his first lodgings, "student" the second time, "writer" the third. His talk was of becoming a painter, then an architect, and in the meantime he has written plays, stories, and an opera. None of these ventures has been successful, but he is undeterred, for next time may be different. Another headstrong young man from the lowest levels of society with an unbounded, and in the eyes of others unfounded, reservoir of self-confidence, lived similarly from hand to mouth for many years with no other ambition than becoming a writer, something he achieved at the age of thirty with the publication of his first novel: Hunger. Van Gogh was another artist of that time who lived in extreme poverty, wanting nothing else than to paint, even though in his lifetime he sold not a single canvas. We have no way of knowing if this was what Hitler was doing, but if it was not, his "no" must then have been all the more emphatic, all the more obstinate, since in that case he was rejecting society itself and all that came with it of work, career, marriage, children. Rather than being a part of that, he chose to live in the gutter. This is not an expression of indolence, but of something else entirely. Could he simply have allowed himself to drift? Nothing would indicate to us that he struggled against it in the way of a man possessed by a particular goal, rather he seems to have positioned a framework of circumstances about his life that slowly but surely sent him to the subterrain, to the flophouse in Meidling at whose doors the subterraneans flock: down-and-outs, tramps, beggars, winos, criminals, the jobless, the poor, hustlers, and fraudsters.

The social problems that existed in Vienna around the turn of the century were huge. Poverty was rampant, the housing shortage severe, several hundred thousand people existed in the most abject circumstances, and still more continued to join them, migrants flooding from all corners of the great empire to converge on its capital. The cost of housing rocketed, and landlords exploited the situation to its limit; the workers' district of Favoriten, Hamann writes, housed an average of ten persons per rental unit, which consisted of one room and a kitchen with no running water. Child mortality was astoundingly four times greater here than in the city's more affluent areas. Almost all basements were utilized for habitation, and beds unused during the daytime were rented out to so-called Bettgeher, literally "bed-goers," homeless people permitted to use a bed for some eight hours or so but not to stay in the apartment the rest of the time. In 1910 the city contained more than eighty thousand of these bed-goers. No system of social security existed, the only poor care being charity-based in the form of soup kitchens, shelters, hostels, and children's homes, all private sector, many of them established by Jewish philanthropists. Some of the needy were lucky enough to be allowed to take leftovers from the taverns and hospitals, and whenever a baker gave away unsold bread, Hamann writes, hordes would descend and fights could break out. The housing shortage became increasingly acute and the so-called shelters, overcrowded with bed-goers during the daytime, began to stay open at nights. The worst conditions, however, were in the illegal sublets. Hamann cites the report of a journalist at the time: the flats are crammed with people unknown to each other, many are children, often they sleep in the same bed, crawling with lice and vermin, inhabiting a single room for cooking, washing, living, sleeping, studying, and carrying out work to earn money; he mentions a stable deemed unfit for animals, inhabited by ten people with three children among them. A two- or three-room apartment in a crumbling, condemned tenement could house eighty or more people, men and women, able and infirm, alcoholics, and prostitutes, and children. "Everything around me was a confused mass of people, rags, and dirt. The room looked like a humongous dirt ball." These places were infested with rats, and disease spread quickly – cholera, tuberculosis, syphilis. Begging generated little income and for many prostitution was the only option, and it was prevalent too among children.

Outside the flophouse in Meidling, which could take in about a thousand people, and where Hitler duly appeared in December of 1909, the destitute lined up in long lines each evening, watched by the guards deployed to prevent rioting among those for whom there would be no room. The newspapers would mention the place only in the case of some tragic incident such as a child freezing to death outside the hostel gates or someone being denied medical assistance and dying there. In 1908 the opposition on the city council moved to establish shelters and to open up tram sheds to the homeless, but the authorities pointed merely to existing measures, though these were practically nonexistent, claiming, according to Hamann, that no one could possibly be homeless in Vienna without bearing the blame themselves. There was no help to be had from the city, and in this unregulated social mire the immigrant population, in this case Slavs and east-European Jews, ranked lowest; many citizens were of the opinion that the hospitals ought only to accept Austrian natives and turn everyone else away.

Hitler himself describes housing conditions for casual laborers as follows:

> Even more dismal in those days were the housing conditions. The misery in which the Viennese day laborer lived was frightful to behold. Even today it fills me with horror when I think of these wretched caverns, the lodging houses and tenements, sordid scenes of garbage, repulsive filth, and worse.

This was the situation in all of Europe's major cities of the time, and had been ever since the great tides of industrialization and urbanization in the first part of the nineteenth century. This was a new kind of poverty, concentrated in the urban conglomerations where the lowest classes lived so densely, and were so many in number, and so faceless as to be conspicuously referred to throughout the available sources as hordes or masses or armies of poor.

In 1903 the American writer Jack London published a firsthand account of life in the slums of east London, The People of the Abyss, referring to that inner-city area as a ghetto, a place "of remarkable meanness and vastness . . . where two million workers swarm, procreate, and die." Some 1.8 million people in London are estimated to be very poor, he writes, one million exist with one week's wages between them and pauperism. The misery he describes is difficult to take in and comprehend, but the consequences of the extremely high mortality rate and the extremely poor housing conditions are nonetheless clear: here, inside the ghetto of the poor, life is worth less than life outside. It is worth less because death is a constant presence and because the inhuman circumstances in which the poor live are practically insurmountable. In the city's West End, he writes, 18 percent of all children die before the age of five; in the East End 55 percent of all children die before the age of five. In other words, every other child. "And there are streets in London where out of every one hundred children born in a year, fifty die during the next year; and of the fifty that remain, twenty-five die before they are five years old. Slaughter!"

And should the child survive, work awaits in trades that are not merely unhealthy but lethal. In the linen trade wet feet and wet clothes, a result of the preparation of the flax, lead to bronchitis, pneumonia and severe rheumatism, and the women, who start work at the age of seventeen or eighteen, break down and are physically destroyed by the time they reach thirty. Laborers in the chemical industry, "picked from the strongest and most splendidly built men to be found," live on average less than forty-eight years. In the potter's trade dust gradually settles into the lungs until eventually a case of plaster is formed, making breathing more and more difficult, until finally it ceases.

Jack London wrote his book in 1903 in London, thirty-five years after Karl Marx published the first volume of his Das Kapital but only eighteen and nine years respectively after the posthumous publication of volumes two and three. Jack London was a socialist, The People of the Abyss an attempt to raise awareness by entering into a world usually viewed from some great distance, and to describe that world from the inside. It contains no analysis, but a wealth of emotions; indignation and resignation being the most dominant. Das Kapital, on the other hand, is an analysis of the fundamental preconditions of the misery Jack London describes: commodities, labor, and capital. Theoretical as it is, the work includes lengthy statistically based descriptions of conditions among the lowest class, the same people London would later visit, which at the time, in the 1850s and 1860s, were not much different to those in the first decade of the twentieth century. In his Chapter 25, "General Law of Capitalist Accumulation," Marx tries to outline the circumstances that led to the "intoxicating augmentation of wealth and power" that industrialization had brought about for the privileged classes, not in this instance conditions in the workplace, in themselves appalling, with working days of sixteen, seventeen hours or more in cramped spaces with little light or ventilation, but conditions outside the workplace, the standards of diet and housing of the most poorly situated workers. In 1855, the official list of paupers in England numbered 851,369 persons, these being people without employment and relying on public alms for their survival, while in 1864, due to the crisis in the cotton industry, that figure rose to 1,014,978 persons. These are people living below the very minimum level of existence.

These enormous numbers of poor were an unmanageable problem for society insofar as the colossal changes in production circumstances of which they were a result, the massive industrialization that had taken place, found no counteraction in any form of societal planning or governance; poverty's bottomless pit, concentrated as it was in huge ghetto-like areas of the inner city, arose over a period of only a few decades, and many considered it to be the result of some kind of natural law or force of nature, not least in the wake of Darwin's breakthrough theory of the survival of the fittest, whose axiom was applied equally to the social domain, and the apparent moral and spiritual decline that accompanied it was seen to derive from a kind of human inferiority, self-inflicted, irremedially mushrooming among the lowest classes.

It was as if a whole new society or societal order had arisen within the framework of the old, and the huge pressure it applied to its structures cannot be underestimated. Prior to industrialization, in rural society there were no classes at all but status and strata, and poverty found quite different forms, dealt with in different ways altogether. Marx's analyses, as an instrument by which to understand the enormous upheavals that had taken place in society, were of course invaluable. He had experienced the consequences of poverty at first hand, three of his own children having died when they were still small, and he had seen misery with his own eyes in the great English industrial areas from whence it had spread, seemingly systematically, as if according to its own laws, to large parts of the world.

Industrialism knew no boundaries; nor indeed did the misery that followed in its wake, and the fierce political strife that divided Europe at the beginning of the twentieth century was in the main a matter of a horizontal, transgressional solution versus a vertical, national solution. In other words, identification with class or with place. Hitler, who came from a small petty-bourgeois environment in a relatively homogenous town, source of all his ideals, accorded much emphasis to the poverty issue in Mein Kampf, written at a time when the decay of which he had been a part no longer threatened to consume him. His understanding of it was primarily structural:

> If I did not wish to despair of the men who constituted my environment at that time, I had to learn to distinguish between their external characters and lives and the foundations of their development. Only then could all this be borne without losing heart. Then, from all the misery and despair, from all the filth and outward degeneration, it was no longer human beings that emerged, but the deplorable results of deplorable laws; and the hardship of my own life, no easier than the others, preserved me from capitulating in tearful sentimentality to the degenerate products of this process of development.
> No, this is not the way to understand all these things!

Hitler recognized poverty as a major political problem and he was just as distraught about its inhumanity as Karl Marx and Jack London, but in Vienna it had not only emerged within a relatively homogenous working class as in London, but was exacerbated by great numbers of immigrants from all corners of the empire converging on the city in the hope of finding work, and the ethnic conflicts that were so rife there in that period are crucial to Hitler's way of understanding his surroundings and the time in which he lived. He was born a German in Austria, his father was a German nationalist, albeit moderately so, loyal to the Kaiser, while many of his teachers at school and the majority of students cultivated a more radical German nationalism, and the idea of the supremacy of the nation, not merely in constitutional terms but almost as if it were some kind of metaphysical entity, pervades every conception in Mein Kampf, and also, if we are to go by Kubizek's memoir, everything else he thought as a young man when it came to politics. When Hitler observed such gross social injustice he did not look firstly toward class relations in search of a solution, but to relations between peoples. In the Greater Germanic Reich of which he dreamed there would be no division between burgher and aristocrat, but between German and non-German. It was on this basis that he was already at the age of eighteen a confirmed anti-Marxist. The international orientation of Marxism went against everything he stood for. He was anticapitalist for the same reason. And the fact that he knew what it meant to be poor, and had seen firsthand the huge and inhuman poverty that existed in Vienna, was surely significant in the formation of his viewpoints on social misery as expressed in Mein Kampf, where rather than being seen as a problem of class structure, it is understood as a combined consequence of the disintegrating Dual Monarchy and international capitalism. That his meticulousness and overarching need for control moreover may be seen as a kind of embodiment of the wish to delimit and localize even the biggest structures into more manageable units, in the same way as his fear of everything that spreads, everything that crosses boundaries, like disease and flotsam, may be seen as a kind of embodiment of all the great currents and forces that were at work in his time and which knew no boundaries of nation, is not quite as tenuous and forced as it might appear, for if there is something going on in Mein Kampf it is precisely an interpretation of the external world on the basis of the feelings and temperament of the internal being.

After the turn of the century, Vienna was, socially speaking, one of the most backward cities in Europe.

Dazzling riches and loathsome poverty alternated sharply. In the center and in the inner districts you could really feel the pulse of this realm of fifty-two millions, with all the dubious magic of the national melting pot. The Court with its dazzling glamor attracted wealth and intelligence from the rest of the country like a magnet. Added to this was the strong centralization of the Habsburg monarchy in itself.

It offered the sole possibility of holding this medley of nations together in any set form. But the consequence was an extraordinary concentration of high authorities – in the imperial capital.

Yet not only in the political and intellectual sense was Vienna the center of the old Danube monarchy, but economically as well. The host of high officers, government officials, artists, and scholars was confronted by an even greater army of workers, and side by side with aristocratic and commercial wealth dwelt dire poverty. Outside the palaces on the Ring loitered thousands of unemployed, and beneath this Via Triumphalis of old Austria dwelt the homeless in the gloom and mud of the canals.

In hardly any German city could the social question have been studied better than in Vienna. But make no mistake. This "studying" cannot be done from lofty heights. No one who has not been seized in the jaws of this murderous viper can know its poison fangs. Otherwise nothing results but superficial chatter and false sentimentality. Both are harmful. The former because it can never penetrate to the core of the problem, the latter because it passes it by. I do not know which is more terrible: inattention to social misery such as we see every day among the majority of those who have been favored by fortune or who have risen by their own efforts, or else the snobbish, or at times tactless and obtrusive, condescension of certain women of fashion in skirts or in trousers, who "feel for the people." In any event, these gentry sin far more than their minds, devoid of all instinct, are capable of realizing. Consequently, and much to their own amazement, the result of their social "efforts" is always nil, frequently, in fact, an indignant rebuff; though this, of course, is passed off as a proof of the people's ingratitude.

> Such minds are most reluctant to realize that social endeavor has nothing in common with this sort of thing; that above all it can raise no claim to gratitude, since its function is not to distribute favors but to restore rights.
> I was preserved from studying the social question in such a way. By drawing me within its sphere of suffering, it did not seem to invite me to "study," but to experience it in my own skin. It was none of its doing that the guinea pig came through the operation safe and sound.

This passage, so typical of Mein Kampf, begins by sketching the divide between Vienna's rich and poor, viewed as if from afar, from the viewpoint of an impersonal "you," which is to say in general terms, though not objectively; the multinational state has a "dubious magic" and the many nationalities held together by the centralizing power are a "melting pot." The preliminary conclusion is that no other city would seem to be as well suited for the study of social issues. However, such a study is possible only at first hand, and, moreover, only by someone "in the jaws of this murderous viper," in other words someone who has actually lived in poverty. What this says is: I was there, I know what I'm talking about, unlike almost everyone else. In this way Hitler lends ethos to his text, the same ethos as is evoked at intervals at the beginning of the book, and gradually, by way of meticulous insistence and the fundamental lack of other perspectives, that ethos becomes increasingly self-propelled, jettisoning "This is true because I say so, having seen it with my own eyes" in favor more simply of "This is true because I say so."

To what purpose does the text employ this legitimacy? It pursues no analysis, presenting only a sudden outburst against those who condescendingly "feel for the people" and who fail to realize that their false charity is degrading to its recipients. Hitler shares this same perspective with Marx, but in Hitler's case, judging by the sudden intensification of mood and the closeness of association of subject matter to writer, signaled by the use of the first-person pronoun, it would seem to have its source in his own experience, entangling moreover with more general misogyny. His conclusion, that genuine social activity consists not in handouts but in the reestablishment of a more just system, was likewise shared by Marx.

In Jack London's depiction of London's East End ghetto, life there is described as raw, brutal, and base, words like barbaric and primitive are employed, and to those who live such a life, at the very bottom of the world, in the most wretched need, men abandoned to drink, for instance, who batter their wives and neglect their children, or women who lose their babies to disease and sickness and who themselves cough and hack and shiver from cold and hunger, no crack of space exists between themselves and their misery to allow them a more generous perspective on their fellow human beings or to insist on maintaining some kind of human-centered mind-set, as Jack London is able to do as he wanders about and observes them as if they were a part of some abominable freak show. Humanity requires at least some minimum of material comforts. As Mackie Messer says in Bertolt Brecht's Threepenny Opera, "Erst kommt das Fressen, dann kommt die Moral" – first food, then morals. The same is true of human worth. For this is what happens in these vast slums, the value of human life, to those who live there as well as to those outside, diminishes. Thus, Jack London:

> No more dreary spectacle can be found on this earth than the whole of the "awful East," with its Whitechapel, Hoxton, Spitalfields, Bethnal Green, and Wapping to the East India Docks. The color of life is gray and drab. Everything is helpless, hopeless, unrelieved, and dirty. Bathtubs are a thing totally unknown, as mythical as the ambrosia of the gods. The people themselves are dirty, while any attempt at cleanliness becomes howling farce, when it is not pitiful and tragic. Strange, vagrant odors come drifting along the greasy wind, and the rain, when it falls, is more like grease than water from heaven. The very cobblestones are scummed with grease.
> Here lives a population as dull and unimaginative as its long gray miles of dingy brick. Religion has virtually passed it by, and a gross and stupid materialism reigns, fatal alike to the things of the spirit and the finer instincts of life.
> It used to be the proud boast that every Englishman's home was his castle. But today it is an anachronism. The Ghetto folk have no homes. They do not know the significance and the sacredness of home life. Even the municipal dwellings, where live the better-class workers, are overcrowded barracks. They > have no home life. The very language proves it. The father returning from work asks his child in the street where her mother is; and back the answer comes, "In the buildings."

> A new race has sprung up, a street people. They pass their lives at work and in the streets. They have dens and lairs into which to crawl for sleeping purposes, and that is all. One cannot travesty the word by calling such dens and lairs "homes." The traditional silent and reserved Englishman has passed away. The sidewalk folk are noisy, voluble, high-strung, excitable – when they are yet young. As they grow older they become steeped and stupefied in beer. When they have nothing else to do, they ruminate as a cow ruminates. They are to be met with everywhere, standing on curbs and corners, and staring into vacancy. Watch one of them. He will stand there, motionless, for hours, and when you go away you will leave him still staring into vacancy. It is most absorbing. He has no money for beer, and his lair is only for sleeping purposes, so what else remains for him to do? He has already solved the mysteries of girl's love, and wife's love, and child's love, and found them delusions and shams, vain and fleeting as dew-drops, quick-vanishing before the ferocious facts of life.

Marx quotes from a report on living standards drawn up in 1863 by one Dr. Simon:

> It must be remembered that privation of food is very reluctantly borne, and that as a rule great poorness of diet will only come when other privations have preceded it. Long before insufficiency of diet is a matter of hygienic concern, long before the physiologist would think of counting the grains of nitrogen and carbon which intervene between life and starvation, the household will have been utterly destitute of material comfort; clothing and fuel will have been even scantier than food – against inclemencies of weather there will have been no adequate protection – dwelling space will have been stinted to the degree in which overcrowding produces or increases disease; of household utensils and furniture there will have been scarcely any – even cleanliness will have been found costly or difficult, and if there still be self-respectful endeavors to maintain it, every such endeavor will represent additional pangs of hunger. The home, too, will be where shelter can be cheapest bought; in quarters where commonly there is least fruit of sanitary supervision, least drainage, least scavenging, least suppression of public nuisances, least or worst water supply, and, if in town, least light and air. Such are the sanitary dangers to which poverty is almost certainly exposed, when it is poverty enough to imply scantiness of food. And while the sum of them is of terrible magnitude against life, the mere scantiness of food is in itself of very serious moment . . . These are painful reflections, especially when it is remembered that the poverty to which they advert is not the deserved poverty of idleness. In all cases it is the poverty of working populations. Indeed, as regards the indoor operatives, the work which obtains the scanty pittance of food is for the most part excessively prolonged. Yet evidently it is only in a qualified sense that the work can be deemed self-supporting . . . And on a very large scale the nominal self-support can be only a circuit, longer or shorter, to pauperism.

The intimate connection between the pangs of hunger of the most industrious layers of the working class, and the extravagant consumption, coarse or refined, of the rich, for which capitalist accumulation is the basis, reveals itself only when the economic laws are known. It is otherwise with the "housing of the poor." Every unprejudiced observer sees that the greater the centralization of the means of production, the greater is the corresponding heaping together of the laborers, within a given space; that therefore the swifter the capitalistic accumulation, the more miserable are the dwellings of the working-people. "Improvements" of towns, accompanying the increase of wealth, by the demolition of badly built quarters, the erection of palaces for banks, warehouses, etc., the widening of streets for business traffic, for the carriages of luxury, and for the introduction of tramways, etc., drive away the poor into even worse and more crowded hiding places. On the other hand, every one knows that the dearness of dwellings is in inverse ratio to their excellence, and that the mines of misery are exploited by house speculators with more profit or less cost than ever were the mines of Potosí. The antagonistic character of capitalist accumulation, and therefore of the capitalistic relations of property generally, is here so evident, that even the official English reports on this subject teem with heterodox onslaughts on "property and its rights." With the development of industry, with the > accumulation of capital, with the growth and "improvement" of towns, the evil makes such progress that the mere fear of contagious diseases which do not spare even "respectability," brought into existence from 1847 to 1864 no less than 10 Acts of Parliament on sanitation, and that the frightened bourgeois in some towns, as Liverpool, Glasgow, etc., took strenuous measures through their municipalities. Nevertheless Dr. Simon, in his report of 1865, says:

> "Speaking generally, it may be said that the evils are uncontrolled in England."

And Hitler:

> In a basement apartment, consisting of two stuffy rooms, dwells a worker's family of seven. Among the five children there is a boy of, let us assume, three years. This is the age in which the first impressions are made on the consciousness of the child. Talented persons retain traces of memory from this period down to advanced old age. The very narrowness and overcrowding of the room does not lead to favorable conditions. Quarreling and wrangling will very frequently arise as a result. In these circumstances, people do not live with one another, they press against one another. Every argument, even the most trifling, which in a spacious apartment can be reconciled by a mild segregation, thus solving itself, here leads to loathsome wrangling without end. Among the children, of course, this is still bearable; they always fight under such circumstances, and among themselves they quickly and thoroughly forget about it. But if this battle is carried on between the parents themselves, and almost every day in forms which for vulgarity often leave nothing to be desired, then, if only very gradually, the results of such visual instruction must ultimately become apparent in the children. The character they will inevitably assume if this mutual quarrel takes the form of brutal attacks of the father against the mother, of drunken beatings, is hard for anyone who does not know this milieu to imagine. At the age of six the pitiable little boy suspects the existence of things which can inspire even an adult with nothing but horror. Morally poisoned, physically undernourished, his poor little head full of lice, the young "citizen" goes off to public school. After a great struggle he may learn to read and write, but that is about all. His doing any homework is out of the question. On the contrary, the very mother and father, even in the presence of the children, talk about his teacher and school in terms which are not fit to be repeated, and are more inclined to curse the latter to their face than to take their little offspring across their knees and teach them some sense. All the other things that the little fellow hears at home do not tend to increase his respect for his dear fellow men. Nothing good remains of humanity, no institution remains unassailed; beginning with his teacher and up to the head of the government, whether it is a question of religion or of morality as such, of the state or society, it is all the same, everything is reviled in the most obscene terms and dragged into the filth of the basest possible outlook. When at the age of fourteen the young man is discharged from school, it is hard to decide what is stronger in him: his incredible stupidity as far as any real knowledge and ability are concerned, or the corrosive insolence of his behavior, combined with an immorality, even at this age, which would make your hair stand on end.

What position can this man to whom even now hardly anything is holy, who, just as he has encountered no greatness, conversely suspects and knows all the sordidness of life, occupy in the life into which he is now preparing to emerge?

The three-year-old child has become a fifteen-year-old despiser of all authority. Thus far, aside from dirt and filth, this young man has seen nothing which might inspire him to any higher enthusiasm.

But only now does he enter the real university of this existence.

Now he begins the same life which all along his childhood years he has seen his father living. He hangs around the street corners and bars, coming home God knows when; and for a change now and then he beats the broken-down being which was once his mother, curses God and the world, and at length is convicted of some particular offense and sent to a house of correction.

There he receives his last polish.

And his dear bourgeois fellow men are utterly amazed at the lack of "national enthusiasm" in this young "citizen."

Day by day, in the theater and in the movies, in backstairs literature and the > yellow press, they see the poison poured into the people by bucketfuls, and then they are amazed at the low "moral content," the "national indifference," of the masses of the people.

It seems unlikely Hitler came close to any such family in Vienna; at the time he was living outside history, in the sense that we have no eyewitness accounts of his life then, firstly in a room on his own for a year, then in the weeks and months of homelessnesss before his appearance at the flophouse, when it seems reasonable to assume he was sleeping rough in the parks rather than in some overcrowded basement lodging with a family he did not know. His description is an example, a concretization of something otherwise abstract, the decline of working-class youth in the face of social circumstances. Hitler provides many examples throughout Mein Kampf, though practically no narrative such as this, and certainly he never seems to empathize with his examples the way he does here, where moreover he appeals to the reader's sympathies in a way that seeems quite out of keeping with the tone of the book as a whole. There is also an element of identification.

Ian Kershaw suggests there might be a touch of autobiography here, writing:

> A passage in Mein Kampf, in which Hitler ostensibly describes the conditions in a worker's family where the children have to witness drunken beatings of their mother by their father, may well have drawn in part on his own childhood experiences. What the legacy of all this was for the way Adolf's character developed must remain a matter for speculation. That its impact was profound is hard to doubt.

If indeed he is giving vent to experiences from his own childhood here, as if under cover of the example's neutrality he somehow were able to write about himself, then it is the only instance that occurs.

Respect for human life need not necessarily be diminished by the baseness of what Hitler saw in Vienna, though this may certainly happen, and apparently did so in Hitler's case, even though he clearly states in Mein Kampf that it did not, emphasizing that the individual is without blame in his or her misery, which rather is brought about by a miserable system. But how does he express this?

> Then, from all the misery and despair, from all the filth and outward degeneration, it was no longer human beings that emerged, but the deplorable results of deplorable laws; and the hardship of my own life, no easier than the others, preserved me from capitulating in tearful sentimentality to the degenerate products of this process of development.

This is a treacherous statement, typical not only of Hitler but of the times. By saying it is not the fault of the individual that he or she has become brutalized, but of the system within which the individual exists, one thereby expresses a humanistic attitude by which it is emphasized that it is the conditions under which the people live that are unfit and wretched, rather than people themselves. However, one consequence of this is that the individual is thereby seen to be a manifestation of class, and if class is the important category here, then the life of the individual diminishes in value, being seen in relation to the common goal. Not the face or the name, but the mass and the number. The reduction or absorption of the individual by the mass was indeed a new phenomenon, a direct and highly perceptible result of industrialization and urbanization: hordes of poor, in which the individual was an expression not of itself but its poverty; droves of workers filing in and out of factory gates in the mornings and evenings; armies of protesters taking to the streets, converging into surging crowds marching on the squares and parks. Baudelaire was fascinated by the city's rivers of people in which the dandy so to speak bathed, Chaplin juxtaposes herded sheep with workers milling toward a factory in Modern Times, and Hamsun, primarily and in everything the individualist and therefore never one to hold the worker in contempt, only the mass in which the worker himself was everyone and no one, the rabble, had his protagonist in the 1920s, August, come to a grisly end, swept under by a tide of sheep. A recurring motif in the literature of the Weimar Republic was the human mass, and a frequently employed perspective was that of remoteness, in which the human world seemed to consist of busy swarms of insects or great flocks of teeming animals. The reduction of the human that such a perspective entailed was not unambiguous, since at this time, perhaps more than any other, the power of the masses and the potential they held for change began to be understood.

Another consequence of the mass perspective is that it propels the human in the direction of biology, the biological human. Jack London's urban exploration of 1903 construed man as a cow, and in describing how the ghetto is constantly drained of its best stock he uses for his metaphor the image of blood being drawn from the body. This was a common way of thinking, such metaphors were in frequent usage, no one found them to be suspect, no one was anxious about their use, as yet they were unladen with cruelty, still neutral in a way. The fact that blood became the great symbol of the national socialist movement has to do with man as a mass as well as with man as biology, for blood is the same for all of us, the same blood in the rich as in the poor, in the educated as in the uneducated, and in its being bound up with the people, das Volk, whose institutional expression was the nation-state, blood moreover separated out those who did not belong, according to the racial theory of the day, which again was in no way frowned upon, issuing as it did from those most elevated seats of learning, the universities.

Hitler never formulated any ideological manifesto apart from what may be gleaned from the various reasonings, assertions, and analyses that go to make up Mein Kampf, and which in actual fact cannot be extracted from it without turning them into something else, for the most unusual aspect of the book is that it is so characterized by impulsive notions, so inextricably bound up with the temperament of its author and with its time by virtue of the psychology that is transported backward and forward throughout its pages, and also so intent on building up a persona by way of this peculiar plainsong, as we might call it, of indignation, self-assertion, and obdurate resentment, that any superstructure would ring false, so no, there is no superstructure here, nor any kind of consolidated whole, the sheer centrifugal force of pettiness and rhetorical crudeness being so strong as to prevent this.

Language, more so than the image, is intimately connected with the social environment, and while the Nazis' meticulous orchestrations were able to mobilize the seductive power that lies in the mythological and in the past, and while they managed to make tangible the idea of the nation as rendering each and every individual significant, Hitler's own language is stuck in prosaic experience, which is to say the hum and sputter of the linguistic reality that surrounded him in Vienna, where for instance anti-Jewish sentiment was rife in the press, and where the air was thick with political agitation and propaganda as if the great political issues of the day had been taken out into the streets and deprived of any Olympian perspective, construed there as manifestations of the own, the local, the private: What are the Czechs doing here? What are the Jews doing here? The housing situation is critical, poverty rampant, inflation spiraling. There are mass protests and riots, windows and streetlights are smashed, trams and motor cars vandalized, troops are deployed, violence spreads through the workers' districts. What will happen if a revolution comes? The violence escalates, tangibly at street level, in clashes between police and protesters, police and homeless, police and the poor, and within families, but also at the structural level, in the shape of a societal order that looks after the well-to-do and completely ignores everyone else. Parliament has ceased to function and is in a state of near-dissolution; with its myriad of political parties from the disparate countries and cultures of the Dual Monarchy it can barely muster a quorum, representatives fighting for attention with whistles, children's trumpets, and rattles, Hamann writes, as indeed Hitler himself witnessed during his first year in Vienna, when he would often drag Kubizek along with him to spend entire days in the parliament, barely able to contain his excitement, according to his friend. Hitler immerses himself in political reading, mostly newspapers, pamphlets, and journals, and it is in the secondary, popularized form he becomes familiar with the works of some of the great and most controversial thinkers of the age, such as Darwin, Nietzsche, Chamberlain, and Schopenhauer, so Hamann tells us. Inherent in the zeitgeist was dwindling esteem for academia and scientific knowledge, while idiosyncratic and autodidactic thinkers seething with distrust of the establishment flourished, and what we know of Hitler's preferences at the time, of which he later offers glimpses, points, according to Hamann, almost exclusively in the direction of such unorthodox, unscientific renegade figures. So in the year he lived alone in his room, socializing with not a soul, we can assume theirs were the works he read, and without academic or even human context of any sort everything was then down to his own judgment and instinct, and this lack of opportunity for correction was perhaps the most characteristic aspect of his private world of thought. What few books he might have owned must have been sold when his money ran out, because when Hanisch encounters him in Meidling in December 1909 he owns nothing but the clothes on his back.

That evening, when after a year and a half hidden from the light of history he once more steps into it by joining the line outside a flophouse two and a half hours on foot from the city center, thereby to have his name registered in the police archive, tired, cold, and hungry, in a shabby purple suit, pale and thin, twenty years old, with eyes that in Kubizek's words dominated his features with the piercing look Kubizek's mother found almost frightening, he is not the all of everyone, nor is he the nothing of no one, for though he is unimportant in the eyes of others, to all intents and purposes socially nonexistent, there is no reason to believe that the grandiosity of his self-image, this boundless belief in his own abilities, has been entirely lost. Weakened it must surely have been, however, for this is the nadir of his life, quite intolerable for a young man of Hitler's self-confidence and pride, yet in the picture Hanisch paints of him he appears meek and without resistance.

The hostel plays an important social role, a source of information about places to keep warm in the day and sleep at night, favorable begging pitches and possible openings as to a chance of work. To Hitler, Hanisch became a kind of helper; they began to hang out together. In the daytime they would look for work, in the evenings they bedded down in one of the establishments that existed, a night shelter in Edberg, for instance, and another in Favoriten, perhaps then to return to Meidling again. According to Hanisch Hitler was unsuited to physical labor; once, some men were needed for ditch digging, but Hanisch advised him against it, realizing it would be too much for him. Instead, Hitler hung around the railway station offering to carry luggage for people, or, when winter came, he stood in line to shovel snow, though without a winter coat, freezing and coughing miserably – he did this only a few times, Hanisch reports. So helpless and frail was he that he was even considered poor compared to the other destitutes who at least could labor for a day's wages. Hitler "thought of all sorts of jobs, but he was much too weak for hard physical work."

This is in stark contrast to Hitler's own account of this period in Mein Kampf.

> The actual business of finding work was, as a rule, not hard for me, since I was not a skilled craftsman, but was obliged to seek my daily bread as a so-called helper and sometimes as a casual laborer.
> I adopted the attitude of all those who shake the dust of Europe from their feet with the irrevocable intention of founding a new existence in the New World and conquering a new home. Released from all the old, paralyzing ideas of profession and position, environment and tradition, they snatch at every livelihood that offers itself, grasp at every sort of work, progressing step-by-step to the realization that honest labor, no matter of what sort, disgraces no one. I, too, was determined to leap into this new world, with both feet, and fight my way through.
> I soon learned that there was always some kind of work to be had, but equally soon I found out how easy it was to lose it.
> The uncertainty of earning my daily bread soon seemed to me one of the darkest sides of my new life.

This may not be untrue, but knowing that he earned money carrying luggage at the railway station and shoveling snow, a young man who in his adult life so far has set his sights exclusively on becoming an artist, but has failed and withdrawn from all human company, tormented and grossly humiliated, a loser in the eyes of all others, the comparison with the pioneers in America, who worked the soil and made fields and built houses, seems eccentric to say the least. But this is what Mein Kampf is like: Hitler construes his poverty in words that fall sorely short of its actual consequences, yet rather than denying it he instead turns it into something immensely powerful and productive, weaving it into a political viewpoint that finds much of its force in, and indeed practically bases itself on, this distortion of his life.

A person such as this, in whom a pervasive sense of inner nobility buffers all outer abjection, was of course the main character in Knut Hamsun's novel Hunger, published seventeen years before Hitler's own wretchedness in Vienna. Like Hitler, Hamsun's character exists from hand to mouth in a city where he knows no one, has no friends, no job or income of any sort other than the money he occasionally earns writing a piece for a newspaper. He harbors the ambition of becoming a writer, the idea of which is the only thing that keeps him going. Applying for work at a fire station he is met with rejection, and subsequently makes no further effort to find a job, instead spending his days drifting about the streets, trying to write, trying to think, moving to increasingly shabbier lodgings, disgusted by the poverty that surrounds him. He never mentions the place he grew up, his childhood or youth, his parents, brothers, or sisters, it is as if they do not exist. He is himself only, and though in the profoundest material need, he never once doubts himself.

Hitler possessed the same self-belief and some measure of the same feverish imagination; at the hostel in Meidling he is reported by Hanisch to have claimed that science would soon eliminate the force of gravity from objects, allowing even the heaviest iron blocks to be moved from place to place without difficulty, and that people would in future nourish themselves with pills alone.

His mode of survival too is highly reminiscent of Hamsun's hero; not short pieces in the newspapers, but small paintings he sells in inns and drinking establishments.

Selling paintings was Hanisch's idea. Hitler lied and told him he had attended the Academy. Hanisch suggested he paint to earn a living. Hitler buys the necessaries and starts work; since the shelters are overcrowded he sits painting at cafés while Hanisch hawks the canvases around. They do brisk business and before long can move into a new, permanent men's hostel a cut above the ones for the very poorest; here they pay a modest sum each week for a small private cubicle with a bed and a daily meal. The hostel is big, housing some five hundred residents, for some it's a permanent home, though for most a temporary measure. About 70 percent of the residents are under the age of thirty-five. Seventy percent are workers and tradesmen, the remainder coachmen, shop assistants, waiters, gardeners, unskilled men, and unemployed, with a smattering of fallen aristocrats, unsuccessful artists, divorcés and bankrupts, Hamann writes. The ethnic backgrounds represented were quite as diverse. Hitler lived for three years in this environment. He had his own cubicle, where he could relax between the hours of eight in the evening and nine in the morning. There was a dining room and two reading rooms, one for smokers, one for nonsmokers. There were newspapers and a small library for the use of the residents, where Hitler according to Hanisch spent most of his time. He would read the papers in the mornings, paint during the day, and read in the evenings, provided he was not attending one of the many public debates and discussions that still went on all around the city, where the political challenges were so great and so conspicuous. Selling his canvases meant Hitler and Hanisch made just enough money to pay for rent and food, though not enough for clothes, and by Hanisch's account Hitler kept his coat on indoors for a period, having a hole in the seat of his trousers and no shirt to cover it. To make ends meet Hitler needed to paint a picture a day. Hanisch kept him to the grindstone, Hitler eventually becoming so annoyed with him that after a year and a half, in June 1910, he turned to another occupant, Josef Neumann, and asked him to take over the sale of his pictures. Hitler had previously disappeared from the hostel for a whole week in the company of Neumann without informing Hanisch and was obviously quite friendly with him. Liljegren writes that they toured the art galleries together.

Eleven years Hitler's senior, Neumann was, moreover, a Jew, so if Hitler did hold any anti-Semitic views at this stage they most certainly cannot have featured as prominently in his mind as they would later. Nothing suggests that he did. His political views were, however, nationalistic, he was against the Social Democrats, and anti-Marxist, and according to Hanisch held the workers in low esteem, saying repeatedly that they were "an indolent mass that cared about nothing but eating, drinking, and women," in other words possessing no sense of life's finer cultural values, interested only in its material level. Yet one must assume Hitler's own self-image at this time to have been somewhat muddled; certainly he painted, in the region of seven or eight hundred pictures during the period, but there is little reason to believe he saw any prestige at all in what was entirely a matter of earning money for his survival; in 1939 he would prohibit their continued sale, presumably embarrassed and unpleasantly affected by their circulation.

But if he was not an artist, not an architect, not a worker, and not a layabout, what was he then? Did he consider this to be a gap, an interlude while waiting for better times? And what did he expect such times to bring?

What separates Hamsun's young alter ego in Hunger from Hitler is that Hamsun would later write the book he imagined he would and break through as a writer, whereas in Hitler's case nothing happens. Why not? For want of talent? For want of drive? Was he not strong enough to cope with the lack of artistic environment his marginalization entailed? Did he give up and allow himself to drift aimlessly wherever his fortunes might take him?

His youthful reveries about art were perhaps more to do with the life of the artist than with art as such; in contrast to the civil servant, the artist's life is an expression of the self, a person is an artist by virtue of being that self, with that particular talent, and such a thought must surely have appealed to him. He saw no need to work for the sake of achievement, it was sufficient simply to be the person he was. Only one figure could transcend the rigid framework of bourgeois culture and elevate himself above it, one figure of whom this moreover was expected, and that figure was the genius. The one against the mass's many. This was an idea born of the understanding that the one should manage the culture of the many, and this by its idealization, by evoking the sense of there being something the many could reach out and long for, by distilling the insights of the many into one: such is our life in this world. This is the mandate of Goethe and Wagner. What happened in art at the end of the nineteenth century was that this figure, the artist genius, altered character. The one no longer represented the all, but went against them. An example is Munch. He went beyond the social world – not positively, but negatively. He was met with scorn and disdain. To do this, to not be a part of the all but to express his particular self, which so deviated from the accepted mainstream, he had to either go against it, which required enormous strength, or be unattached to it. In Munch's case, as in the case of many artists, he chose to be unattached, living for long periods of his life within himself, having little or no contact with family and practically no friends. Only then could he go beyond, for Munch was not Hans Jæger, and lacked his strength and will. Jæger lived in the social world, cavorted with the social world, went to the wall in the social world. Munch turned away, turned in, painted. Such solitude and lack of social attachment was not dissimilar to the way Hitler was living during this period of his life, but in Hitler's case this transgression of the bourgeois was only social in nature, not artistic. On the contrary, his aesthetic was identical with that of bourgeois culture, sharing with it the imperative that art should be splendid, beautiful, ideal.

The foremost shaper of such a conception of art, to many still so obvious as to resemble a law, was perhaps G. E. Lessing, who put the idea into words in his Laocoon, originally published in 1766, in which he writes of the difference between ugliness and beauty in art. The ugly form "wounds our sight, offends our sense of order and harmony, and excites aversion without regard to the actual existence of the object in which we perceive it." Lessing divides art into two: imitative art, which seeks to reproduce reality the way it is, and art that strives for beauty. "Painting as imitative skill can express ugliness; painting as a fine art will not express it. In the former capacity its sphere extends over all visible objects; in the latter it confines itself to those which produce agreeable impressions." To Lessing's mind, ugliness in art was a threat also to order and harmony in society as a whole, and he wished to forbid representation of ugliness altogether in favor exclusively of art that presented beauty. "The object of art . . . is pleasure, and pleasure is not indispensable. What kind and what degree of pleasure shall be permitted may justly depend on the law-giver."

With the advent of realism in the middle of the nineteenth century, which represented ugliness as well as beauty, the hideous as well as the sublime, Lessing's view of art fell into decline, though no more so than that the bourgeoisie reacted with repugnance and rage at the direction in which painting was going at the turn of the century, which they believed had nothing to do with art, since it did not elevate or make agreeable, but was the expression merely of the sick mind of the artist.

Hitler, who wished to transcend the bourgeois by following the path of genius, almost brims over with the same ideas:

> Thus, the saddest thing about the state of our whole culture of the pre-War period was not only the total impotence of artistic and cultural creative power in general, but the hatred with which the memory of the greater past was besmirched and effaced. In nearly all fields of art, especially in the theater and literature, we began around the turn of the century to produce less that was new and significant, but to disparage the best of the old work and represent it as inferior and surpassed; as though this epoch of the most humiliating inferiority could surpass anything at all. And from this effort to remove the past from the eyes of the present, the evil intent of the apostles of the future could clearly and distinctly be seen. By this it should have been recognized that these were no new, even if false, cultural conceptions, but a process of destroying all culture, paving the way for a stultification of healthy artistic feeling: the spiritual preparation of political Bolshevism. For if the age of Pericles seems embodied in the Parthenon, the Bolshevistic present is embodied in a cubist monstrosity.

In 1907 and 1908, when Hitler applied for admission to the Academy, painting was exploring its forms of expression in hitherto unprecedented ways, as for instance in the Expressionism of Munch, Kirchner, and Nolde, the Fauvism of Matisse, Derain, and Vlaminck, the Cubism of Braque and Picasso, the radical simplification and nascent abstractions of Burliuk and Kandinsky, the Primitivism of Jawlensky, to mention but a few examples of the hugely radical currents that ran through European culture of the day, Vienna being one if its most important cities.

The question that arises is of the kind of relationship that exists between the contemporary age and its art, whether art is simply a weather vane occupation, a fashionable way of life whose purpose is to do what everyone else is doing, though not "everyone else" in the sense of anyone at all, but a defining elite, the happy few, the standard-bearers of the arts, those on everyone's lips in all the cafés, culture then being a locus of ingratiation?

Hitler looked on these currents as a sign of decay; the latest thing, the new, the next has nothing to do with art in Hitler's eyes, to him art is the expression of something everlasting and timeless. He shows no understanding of how inextricably the everlasting and the timeless in art is bound up with the contemporary and the social, or how crucial that dynamic, between what is living and what is dead, is to its power of expression and to its significance, and the reasons for this failure to comprehend are presumably the same ones as make it impossible for him to conceal the low and small-minded aspects of his person in his writing, which is to say a poorly developed sense of form, according to which content and the feelings it gives rise to are the only things of real importance.

But his failure as an artist is not down to being out of touch with the zeitgeist. That none of these currents is present in Hitler's pictures is hardly surprising and tells us little else about him other than that he was the product of the lower middle class and excluded from what was happening at the vortex of the culture, or else he excluded himself, in that he chose to adhere so firmly to the preferences of his class, these not yet having been deemed void nor necessarily entirely forsaken; the Academy to which he sought entrance, held in such great esteem, guarded the same neoclassicist and realistic aesthetic that formed the basis of his own painting. That he was not accepted to study there would seem more due to the lack of expressive force in his painting, the almost exclusively decorative nature of his canvases, which possess no element of self. On the other hand he was only seventeen years old when he applied there, and only a couple of years older when he was painting his other pictures. A relevant comparison could be Hamsun's early attempts at the novel, for instance, Bjørger, which in the same kind of way lacks originality and is without soul, an image of what its author saw to be literature, where the idea of the literary stands between himself and the world, much as the way Hitler's idea of what art was and should be stood between him and what he painted. The presence of such an idea is destructive enough in itself, but in Hitler's and Hamsun's cases its destructive thrust was compounded by its provincial and homely nature. Their social points of departure were not dissimilar, though Hamsun was from more humble circumstances by far, his parents near destitute, with no education, and he himself, in contrast to Hitler, had not even finished school. Hamsun taught himself everything, Hitler did too, but whereas Hitler gave up painting, Hamsun stuck at his writing, eventually finding success as a novelist. What Hitler lacked as a painter and Hamsun gained for himself as a writer was intimacy with the form of his art. Hitler's weakness as a painter was that he found no way of expressing his own inner being, or else lacked the will to address it, and perhaps this was the reason he gave up and settled for painting as a simple means of making ends meet.

But what actually was his own inner being?

The writer Ernst Jünger, Hitler's senior by ten years, who came from a considerably more elevated social background, and who in the interwar years came out on the extreme antiliberal and antidemocratic right, published a number of essays in the Nazi Party journal, writing as follows in 1929:

> And I also know that my basic experience, what finds expression through life's events, is the typical experience of my generation, a variation on the motif of the times, an exotic species perhaps, but one that still displays the characteristics of the genus.

Reading biographies of the period, patterns emerge, certain recurrent connections and types, perhaps this is what Jünger means by "a variation on the motif of the times," for the very structure of society and the views by which it is characterized set up spaces that are astonishingly alike, and those who inhabit them go through the same experiences, which become typical for them. Hitler was not the only person in the Habsburg Empire with an authoritarian father and a loving mother, with siblings who perished and dreams of becoming a metropolitan artist. No, the age was full of them. An example is Alfred Kubin, born in 1877, twelve years before Hitler, universe, the impenetrability of bureaucractic process, its incessant deferments and adjournments, so vague and slippery and unassailable, and the authority of the father figure, are of course all important themes in Kafka.

Kafka was six years younger than Kubin and six years older than Hitler, but Prague belonged within the same empire, and as a native speaker of German Kafka related to the same culture as both Kubin and Hitler. He refers to Kubin several times in his diaries. On September 26, 1911, for instance, he writes of Kubin's meeting with Hamsun.

> The artist Kubin recommends Regulin as a laxative, a powdered seaweed that swells up in the bowels, shakes them up, is thus effective mechanically in contrast to the unhealthy chemical effect of other laxatives which just tear through the excrement and leave it hanging on the walls of the bowels. He met Hamsun at Langen. He (Hamsun) grins mockingly for no reason. During the conversation, without interrupting it, he put one foot on his knee, took a large pair of scissors from the table, and trimmed the frayed edges of his trousers. Shabbily dressed, with one or so rather expensive details, his tie, for example. Stories about an artist's pension in Munich where painters and veterinaries lived (the latters's school was in the neighborhood) and where they acted in such a debauched way that the windows of the house across the way, from which a good view could be had, were rented out. In order to satisfy these spectators, one of the residents in the pension would sometimes jump up on the windowsill in the posture of a monkey and spoon his soup out of the pot. A manufacturer of fraudulent antiques who got the worn effect by means of buckshot and who said of a table: "Now we must drink coffee on it three more times, then it can be shipped off to the Innsbruck Museum." Kubin himself: very strong, but somewhat monotonous facial expression, he describes the most varied things with the same movement of muscles. Looks different in age, size, and strength according to whether he is sitting, standing, wearing just a suit, or an overcoat.

Kafka read both Kubin and Hamsun, who met each other in Munich in the company of Hamsun's publisher Langen, probably in 1896. Kubin met with the heads of birds, a vast congregation of helmeted soldiers gathered beneath the towering sculpture of an ox, chopped-up animal carcasses, severed heads on stakes, the state depicted as a trundling machine in a field, suicides, dogs frothing at the mouth, a man with his head between a woman's legs, she in a coffin and thin as a skeleton, another is an actual skeleton, though with a pregnant belly rising like the top of an egg. These are fin de siècle pictures, yet they are filled with a horror of the body, with an extravagance and a mood of man as mass that distinguishes them radically from fin de siècle elsewhere, in other countries; Kubin would have been unthinkable in England, for instance, and also in America, and while some of his pictures come close to the French pastelist Odilon Redon, their mood is nonetheless radically different, finding their like only in other areas of German expressionism of the day, with the exception of some of Goya's darkest and most apocalyptic drawings, in which Kubin most likely found inspiration.

Kubin also left his mark on literature, publishing a single novel, The Other Side, in 1908. The novel tells of an imaginary realm, a city called Pearl, inhabited by some sixty-five thousand souls, located deep in eastern Uzbekistan, separated from the rest of the world by a vast wall and governed by a godlike figure by the name of Patera. The city's inhabitants have come from all corners of the world, many from sanitoriums and health resorts, particularly sensitive individuals full of mad ideas, hyperreligious, obsessed with reading or gambling, neurasthenics and hysterics; to all intents and purposes homeless, these people have entered into the world of the imagination, of which the city is a physical, tangible manifestation. But the presence of Patera, who rules with an iron fist, makes this dream kingdom more of a sinister underworld, a kingdom of the dead devoid of all hope rather than a haven for the escapist.

Kubin wrote his novel following the death of his father, and the father's presence in the name – Patera so closely resembling pater – and the omnipotence of that figure, while remaining so elusive, is of course an image of paternal authority. It is not surprising that Kafka held Kubin in high esteem and was influenced by his work; the dreamlike otherworldliness of his universe, the impenetrability of bureaucractic process, its incessant deferments and adjournments, so vague and slippery and unassailable, and the authority of the father figure, are of course all important themes in Kafka.

Jünger and corresponded with him for a decade, while Hamsun met Hitler in 1943, penning his infamous obituary of him in May 1945. Of these figures, Hamsun hailed from the lowest social rank and from the very periphery of Europe, and belonged moreover to the previous generation, whereas of the others, all of whom were of the same generation and belonged to the same language area, Hitler was from the lowest social rank, with Kubin next above him, then Kafka, then Jünger, who as the son of a factory owner hailed from society's upper echelons. When it came to that generation's overriding experience, the First World War, Hitler and Jünger had served at the front in the German army, Hitler as a corporal and orderly, Jünger as a lieutenant in the infantry, whereas Kafka and Kubin were both exempt from service. When the Nazis were elected into the Reichstag, Hitler offered Jünger a seat in the parliament, which he declined. Hitler, Jünger, Kubin, and Hamsun were right-wing radicals, a fact that influenced their writings to various degrees, whereas Kafka kept himself well out of politics, well out of the sphere of the ideological, this being obvious in his diaries, which reveal him to be as near-dissolved in the trivialities of the quotidian as to quote Kubin's reference to "laxatives which just tear through the excrement and leave it hanging on the walls of the bowels," something neither Hitler, Jünger, Kubin, nor Hamsun could ever have put to paper. That ease within unease, the proximity to his own life in its truest nature, from where everything, even the most imaginative of events, issues, makes his writings much more valid beyond his time than both Jünger's and Kubin's, though perhaps not Hamsun's, whom he admired. In character and temperament Hitler and Hamsun were not unlike each other, and are similar particularly in their being self-made and in the grandiosity of their self-images, though Hamsun, who rose from quite impossible beginnings, was a much more sympathetic social being and an incomparably greater artistic talent. When he met Hitler, a couple of years before the latter's downfall, he saw him as his equal and treated him as any other person he respected, without trepidation or fear, which to Hitler was an affront, only Göring was permitted to challenge him and never without being subjected to his wrath, albeit always forgiven, and Hitler was enraged by the time Hamsun left. Hamsun was from the generation of Hitler's father and was quite as stubborn and authoritarian, so it is hardly odd that Hitler should become so enraged. Kafka, Hitler, and Kubin all struggled with the authority of their fathers, they were loners, tormented to a greater or lesser extent by the fear of contact and, each in his own way, by inhibitions relating to women. Moreover, for all their individuality, all three belonged to the same cultural type. Psychology is also epochal, the mind too has its directions of style, which change through the years.

Hitler was a resident of the Vienna hostel for three years. That he stayed there so long does not mean he found it pleasant; the moment he reached the age of twenty-four and received the final installment of his father's inheritance he went into town, bought himself new clothes, collected his scant possessions, and boarded a train for Munich. The resoluteness of his actions would seem to indicate that he had considered the matter for some time and decided that as soon as he got the money he would leave the city which he would gradually come to despise as if it were the very source of his ill fortune. Traveling with him on the train, which he presumably hoped was going to take him to a new and more prosperous life in the country he loved, at the same time as allowing him to avoid an imminent call-up to the Austrian army, was an acquaintance from the hostel, Rudolf Häusler, a nineteen-year-old who shared Hitler's interest in art, a kind of Kubizek Junior he could lecture and impress, and whose parents, which is to say his mother, took a liking to him. They rented a room together in Munich, in the house of the Popp family, where Hitler registered as an "architectural painter."

There he carried on the life he had lived in Vienna: as soon as his inheritance was spent he began to paint again, wandering the beer halls in the evenings to sell his canvases. Häusler moved out after a few months, leaving Hitler to a life on his own; on the occasions he was invited to supper with the Popp family he declined. In Toland's account, Frau Popp found him an "Austrian charmer," though something of an enigma too: "You couldn't tell what he was thinking," she would later state. Nor could she recall Hitler ever receiving visitors in his room. He would paint in the daytime and read at nights. Frau Popp asked him once what his books had to do with painting, to which he replied, "Dear Frau Popp, does anyone know what is and what isn't likely to be of use to him in life?"

He lived like this for a year in Munich and then the war broke out. Hitler joined up the same day and was sent to the trenches on the French front, where he would remain for four years.

It changed everything.

One of the most famous images of Hitler is from those same days in the summer of 1914. He is in the midst of a great crowd on Munich's Odeonsplatz, beaming a huge smile, one of thousands who have gathered there following the declaration of war on August 2, his face recognized and enlarged in the 1930s after he became Reich chancellor of Germany, but at the time utterly anonymous. A young man wearing a white shirt and dark suit, lifting his hat in the air, hair parted at the side, cheekbones pronounced, sporting a thick black moustache, eyes plainly gleaming with elation. It is a very suggestive photograph, for he is merely one of the crowd, a face among thousands, a fate among thousands, full of the collective zeal that swept through the cities, towns, and villages of Europe in that summer of 1914. To himself, naturally, he was everything, immersed in his life and destiny, a twenty-five-year-old semi-artist with no family and no friends, living in Munich with no direction but with an inner fire now ignited, fed by the fuel of high politics which had so interested him since early youth and by the declaration of war that so unexpectedly provides him and every other member of his generation with the opportunity to act in accordance with the ideals and dreams they have felt so fiercely from as far back as childhood and which bourgeois society, centered as it was around preservation and security, business and commerce, had until then denied them.

The European summer of 1914 was exceptionally balmy, an area of high pressure lingering over the continent for months. Under blue skies and a blazing sun the forests lay "dark and profuse in their tender green," writes

Stefan Zweig, who found himself in the small town of Baden outside Vienna when news of the assassination of Archduke Franz Ferdinand of Austria filtered through. The impression he gives is of carefree abandon. What the war that now lies ahead will bring, no one yet knows, and even if they did, even if they had sensed that it would proceed with such destructive force as to wipe out almost an entire generation of European men, the darkness in which the future lay shrouded would not have endured more than fleetingly in the lethargic, time-steeped tranquillity that emanated from all things: the leafy trees that lined the rivers, the undulating green fields, the cool brick of the village churches, whose lazy bells laid their acoustic cloaks over the old houses, the way Marcel Proust describes life in the French countryside in a book that came out the year before. Ruminating cattle and sheep, horse-drawn carts, the smoke of steam locomotives billowing into the sky. The smell of warm earth and warm grass, the tart, dry taste of cold white wine or the bitter-sweet of cool ale sipped under the parasols of a hotel patio or in the shade of a leafy tree at the side of a road. The dust of the road, the dark currents of the river which sweeps under the bridge, the silvery glimpses of darting fish. The way the summer connects itself to all previous summers, the body and weight of repetition exuded by the landscape, its structures and people in the social domain, making any radical upheaval so hard if not impossible to imagine, though it lies but weeks ahead.

Stefan Zweig leaves Baden and travels to Le Coq, a small seaside resort on the Belgian North Sea coast. People are just as carefree there, he writes; they doze on the beach and soak up the sun, they bathe in the sea, the children fly kites, young people dance on the dykes in the evenings. He moves on to visit a friend, the painter Verhaeren, tension mounts, the threat of war ever growing.

> At once an icy wind of fear blew over the beach and swept it bare. People by the thousands left the hotels and stormed the trains, and even the most optimistic began to pack their bags with speed.

Austria declares war on Serbia, Zweig is on the last train into Germany. On the German side of the border the train suddenly comes to a halt in the darkness. The edgy passengers peer through the windows and see cargo trains passing one after another; beneath the tarpaulins they glimpse the ominous outlines of cannon. Zweig goes on:

> The next morning I was in Austria. In every station placards had been put up announcing general mobilization. The trains were filled with fresh recruits, banners were flying, music sounded, and in Vienna I found the entire city in a tumult. The first shock at the news of war – the war that no one, people or government had wanted – the war which had slipped, much against their will, out of the clumsy hands of the diplomats who had been bluffing and toying with it, had suddenly been transformed into enthusiasm. There were parades in the street, flags, ribbons, and music burst forth everywhere, young recruits were marching triumpantly, their faces lighting up at the cheering – they, the John Does and Richard Roes who usually go unnoticed and uncelebrated.
> And to be truthful, I must acknowledge that there was a majestic, rapturous, and even seductive something in this first outbreak of the people from which one could escape only with difficulty. And in spite of all my hatred and aversion for war, I should not like to have missed the memory of those first days. As never before, thousands and hundreds of thousands felt what they should have felt in peacetime, that they belonged together.

That Zweig, a pacifist all his life, would not have wanted to miss the sense of togetherness that pervaded those first days of August 1914 is telling indeed of the force with which the war swept through the land. Adolf Hitler was not the only one to lift his hat in joy, eyes gleaming, when the declaration came. The enthusiasm was all over Europe, the war was welcomed and celebrated by almost all. The Swedish historian of ideas Svante Nordin, who in his book The Philosophers' War examines the stance of the intellectual community in respect to the war and its outbreak, notes Sigmund Freud's words of July 26 in Vienna: ". . . for the first time for thirty years I feel myself an Austrian and feel like giving this not very hopeful Empire another chance. Morale everywhere is excellent."

On July 27, the British ambassador in Vienna reported: "This country has gone wild at the prospect of war with Serbia, and its postponement or prevention would undoubtedly be a great disappointment."

The poet Rainer Maria Rilke, ten years older than Hitler, also a native of Austria-Hungary, applauded the war's outbreak:

> For the first time I see you rising,
> hearsaid, remote, incredible War God

The otherwise levelheaded and unsentimental Thomas Mann, fourteen years Hitler's senior, wrote the following of those same days some six months later:

> War! It was purification, liberation that we experienced, and an enormous hope . . . It set the hearts of poets aflame . . . How should the artist, the soldier in the artist, not have praised God for the collapse of a world of peace that he had his fill, so completely his fill of?

Kafka too got carried away. Though on the day of the war's outbreak his diary notes matter-of-factly, "Germany has declared war on Russia. Swimming in the afternoon," four days later he writes, "I discover in myself nothing but pettiness, indecision, envy, and hatred against those who are fighting and whom I passionately wish everything ill," then, in a letter to Felice seven months later, "In addition, I mostly suffer from the war because I myself am taking no part."

Of course, not everyone was as enthusiastic about the war. Kafka's friend Max Brod, five years Hitler's senior, reflecting on the war's outbreak, despaired at the apolitical indifference that had allowed it to catch them unawares:

> War to us was simply a crazy idea, of a piece with, say, the perpetual motion machine or the fountain of youth . . . We were a spoiled generation, spoiled by nearly fifty years of peace that had made us lose sight of mankind's worst scourge. No one with any self-esteem ever got involved in politics. Arguments about Wagner's music, about the foundations of Judaism and Christianity, about Impressionist painting and the like seemed infinitely more important . . . And now, overnight, peace had suddenly collapsed. We were quite simply stupid . . . not even pacifists, because pacifism at least presupposes a notion of there being such a thing as war, and of the need to fight against it.

This indifference was widespread, not least in academic circles, where an intellectual such as Martin Heidegger, born in the same year as Hitler and Wittgenstein, making him twenty-five years old when the war broke out, carried on regardless, immersed in debates about nominalism in medieval philosophy.

One of his student friends, Ludwig Marcuse, described the mood at the university in Freiburg during those days in July 1914 in the following way, as cited by Safranski in his Heidegger biography:

> Toward the end of July I encountered one of my most respectable seminar colleagues, Helmuth Falkenfeld, on Goethestrasse. He said despairingly, "Have you heard what's happened?" I said, full of contempt and resignedly, "I know, Sarajaevo." He said, "Not that, tomorrow Rickert's seminar is canceled." I said, alarmed, "Is he sick?" He said, "No, because of the threatening war." I said, "What's the seminar got to do with the war?" He shrugged sadly.

Falkenfeld, Safranski writes, is sent to the front only weeks later, from where he sends Marcuse a letter:

> I continue to be all right, even though the battle in which I participated on October 30 nearly deafened my ears with the roar of twenty-four artillery batteries. Nevertheless . . . I still believe that the third Kantian antonomy is more important than this whole world war and that war is to philosophy as sensuality is to > reason. I simply do not believe that the events of this material world can, even in the least degree, touch upon our transcendental components, and I will not believe it even if a French shell fragment were to tear into my empirical body. Long live transcendental philosophy.

This indifference toward politics, however, is not the same as that recalled and condemned by Max Brod. Brod was deeply involved in the cultural life of the day and simply dismissed politics as unimportant without thereby turning his back on the world. The apathy of these students was altogether more ideological, they saw philosophy as the antithesis of life in society, a space in which the authentic revealed itself beneath the veneer of the social, outside history. According to George L. Mosse in his book The Crisis of German Ideology, academic milieux produced intellectuals "whose ideal was to view the world sub specie aeternitatis," which is to say from the perspective of eternity, Schopenhauer's motto. "Their concern was hardly with mundane, day-to-day affairs," Mosse writes.

This fundamental ideological standpoint, that the social, political, and societal were superficial phenomena behind whose pragmatic façade something more important existed, at least potentially, was widespread throughout prewar German culture, which more than anything cried out for essence and unity. It manifested itself in the wild paintings of the expressionists, who in their powerful subjectivity, their powerful primitiveness strived for the life that lay beneath the sheen of civilization and culture, where instinct and basic human drives prevailed. But it came out too in another, almost diametrically opposed orientation, in which the answer to the rising social unrest and instability that had come with industrialization and modernity was sought and focused in overarching, ahistorical notions such as that of the people and the rootedness of culture. Alienation entailed a loss of meaning that could not be offset by the material. If a single idea recurs throughout the mind-set of the age it is a distaste for the pragmatic and what Wagner in an essay called "soulless materialism." Modernity was characterized as rationality, therefore they turned toward what was not rational, not purposeful, but which transcended such tendencies and found meaning in notions considered timeless and nonpragmatic. The people was one such notion, bringing together concepts of home, nature, culture, and religion, against whose immutable core the constant shifts of industrialism and modernity could only flake away, against whose profound depths, evoked by history, mythology, and religion, the entertainment industry and increasing commercialization of the day appeared abjectly shallow and banal.

The infatuation with art that Zweig describes as so strongly affecting his youth, and which also ran through Hitler's teenage years, was not faddish but genuinely meaningful. Wagner, Hölderlin, Rilke, Hofmannsthal, George, all those writers and poets cultivated by German youth, celebrated the great, the divine, the essential, and they lauded death, too, which lay beyond it all. Stirb und Werde, die and become – something to die for means something to live for. The people, the earth, the war, the hero, death. The local, the own, the great, the eternal. These were the predominant concepts of German culture prior to the outbreak of World War I, and many of those who saw it coming looked on it as a catharsis, long-awaited and good.

What was singular about the enthusiasm many made manifest was that it was not politically but existentially motivated. Thomas Mann expressed pleasure at the collapse of a peaceful world, so full of loathing. Freud regained his belief in Austria as a nation. Rilke wrote of war being a god. Kafka envied the soldiers who were fighting. Georg Simmel saw the war as a great opportunity for Germany and proclaimed his unconditional love of his homeland. But neither Mann, Freud, Rilke, Kafka, nor Simmel took any part in the war, their enthusiasm was that of the onlooker. Ernst Jünger on the other hand, only nineteen years old when war broke out, joined up as a volunteer like Hitler. He kept a diary throughout, publishing in 1920 perhaps the best book about World War I, Storm of Steel. This is how he describes the mood of his generation in the summer of 1914:

> We had come from lecture halls, school desks, and factory workbenches, and over the brief weeks of training, we had bonded together into one large and enthusiastic group. Grown up in an age of security, we shared a yearning for danger, > for the experience of the extraordinary. We were enraptured by war. We had set out in a rain of flowers, in a drunken atmosphere of blood and roses. Surely the war had to supply us with what we wanted; the great, the overwhelming, the hallowed experience. We thought of it as manly, as action, a merry dueling party on flowered, blood-bedewed meadows. "No finer death in all the world than . . ." Anything to participate, not to have to stay at home!

The hallowed dream of greatness and glory, this was what the war was about. Carefree dueling on blood-bedewed meadows, this was the vision. In his biography of Ernst Jünger, Into the Abyss, Thomas Nevin points to some of the origins of this mind-set, noting essay assignments given to students of the gymnasium schools in the Hanover District in the spring of 1914, topics to be discussed including "The Kaiser's words, 'I am a citizen of the German Reich,' words of pride and duty," "War is as terrible as plagues from heaven, but it is good, it is a fate like them," "How authentic is the saying of Frederick the Great, 'Life means being a warrior'?" "The bow when bent first shows its power," "My favorite hero in the Nibelungenlied," "A nation is worthless if it doesn't set everything upon its honor."

Jünger's conceptions of war, Nevin writes, came mainly from his readings of Homer, whose influence was acknowledged by the school's director, Dr. Joseph Riehemann, in his speech to graduating students, who were told that "apart from the light of Christianity, nothing will penetrate your future life with a brighter and warmer glow than Homer's sun."

Europe had been at peace since 1871, and in the war between France and Germany that ended that year, the machine gun as yet to be introduced, transport taking place by means of horse and cart or sailing ship, some 150,000 people lost their lives. In 1914 most believed that this new war would be conducted in much the same way and last no more than a few short months.

In the waning summer of 1914 Hitler too was afraid the war would be over before he got there. In Mein Kampf he writes:

> For me, as for every German, there now began the greatest and most unforgettable time of my earthly existence. Compared to the events of this gigantic struggle, everything past receded to shallow nothingness. Precisely in these days, with the tenth anniversary of the mighty event approaching, I think back with proud sadness on those first weeks of our people's heroic struggle, in which Fate graciously allowed me to take part.
> As though it were yesterday, image after image passes before my eyes. I see myself donning the uniform in the circle of my dear comrades, turning out for the first time, drilling, etc., until the day came for us to march off.
> A single worry tormented me at that time, me, as so many others: would we not reach the front too late? Time and time again this alone banished all my calm. Thus, in every cause for rejoicing at a new, heroic victory, a slight drop of bitterness was hidden, for every new victory seemed to increase the danger of our coming too late.

Two weeks after Germany's declaration of war against Russia, Hitler joined the 16th Bavarian Reserve Regiment in Munich, where he underwent a seven-week stint of basic training. Before being moved on to Augsburg for more intensive training, he visited his landlady's family asking them to pass on word to his sister Angela should he fall in battle. In the event that she did not wish to inherit his few possessions, the Popp family would be welcome to them. He hugged the two children, and Frau Popp wept as he left, Liljegren reports. The regiment marched west for some eleven hours in pouring rain, Hitler writing in a letter to Frau Popp that he had spent the night in a stable, soaked to the skin and unable to sleep. The following day's march took thirteen hours, after which they bivouacked in the open, so cold that another sleepless night awaited. Reaching their destination the next day, they were "deathly tired, ready to drop," Toland writes. There, in the camp at Lechfeld, they trained for two weeks, until October 20, when in the evening they boarded the trains that would take them to the front in Flanders. "I'm terribly happy," Hitler wrote to Frau Popp that same day. "After arrival at our destination I will write immediately and give you my address. I hope we get to England."

Mein Kampf tells us nothing of this, no names are mentioned, no faces appear to us, no detail is described. All we have is Hitler and the war he has entered.

> At last the day came when we left Munich to begin the fulfillment of our duty. For the first time I saw the Rhine as we rode westward along its quiet waters to defend it, the German stream of streams, from the greed of the old enemy. When through the tender veil of the early-morning mist the Niederwald Monument gleamed down upon us in the gentle first rays of the sun, the old "Watch on the Rhine" roared out of the endless transport train into the morning sky, and I felt as though my heart would burst.
> And then came a damp, cold night in Flanders, through which we marched in silence, and when the day began to emerge from the mists, suddenly an iron greeting came whizzing at us over our heads, and with a sharp report sent the little pellets flying between our ranks, ripping up the wet ground; but even before the little cloud had passed, from two hundred throats the first hurrah rose to meet the first messenger of death. Then a crackling and a roaring, a singing and a howling began, and with feverish eyes each one of us was drawn forward, faster and faster, until suddenly past turnip fields and hedges the fight began, the fight of man against man. And from the distance the strains of a song reached our ears, coming closer and closer, leaping from company to company, and just as Death plunged a busy hand into our ranks, the song reached us too and we passed it along: "Deutschland, Deutschland über Alles, über Alles in der Welt!"
> Four days later we came back. Even our step had changed. Seventeen-year-old boys now looked like men.
> The volunteers of the List Regiment may not have learned to fight properly, but they knew how to die like old soldiers.
> This was the beginning.

The List Regiment, to which Hitler belonged, numbered 3,600 men on arrival at Lille on October 23. After the first four days of action at Ypres only 611 were left. Five out of six had perished. The risk of being killed during the push forward was considerably greater than the chance of surviving. The mental effect of such losses on those who survive, with comrade after comrade falling in their midst and every minute potentially one's last, is something known only by those who have been to war. The Battle of Ypres was one of the most comprehensive in the war's initial phases; the British in their efforts to break through the German lines there in October and November lost 58,000 men. Writing to an acquaintance by the name of Ernst Hepp in Munich, Hitler describes the first engagements:

> Now the first shrapnel hisses over and us and explodes at the edge of the forest, splintering trees as if they were straws. We watch with curiosity. We have no idea as yet of the danger. None of us is afraid. Everyone is waiting impatiently for the command, "Forward!" . . . We crawl on our stomachs to the edge of the forest. Above us are howls and hisses, splintered branches and trees surround us. Then again shells explode at the edge of the forest and hurl clouds of stones, earth, and sand into the air, tear the heaviest trees out by their roots, and choke everything in a yellow-green, terribly stinking steam. We cannot lie here forever, and if we have to fall in battle, it's better to be killed outside . . . Four times we advance and have to go back; from my whole batch only one remains beside me, finally he also falls. A shot tears off my right coat sleeve, but like a miracle I remain safe and alive. At 2 o'clock we finally go forward for the fifth time, and this time we occupy the edge of the forest and the farms.

The regimental commander is killed and his deputy seriously wounded. The new commander, Lieutenant Colonel Engelhardt, taking Hitler and another man with him, ventures forward to observe the enemy lines. Detected, they are sprayed with machine-gun fire, Hitler and the other man pulling Engelhardt to safety in a ditch. A thankful Engelhardt tells them he intends recommending the two men for the Iron Cross, but the very next day he is badly wounded when the regimental headquarters tent takes a direct hit from a British grenade, killing three and wounding three of its occupants. Only moments earlier, Hitler, together with three other enlisted men, had been told to vacate the tent to make way for four company commanders, as a result of which perhaps he was saved. "It was the most terrible moment of my life," Hitler would write to Hepp. "We all worshipped Lieutenant Colonel Engelhardt."

The new adjutant, Lieutenant Wiedeman, recommends Hitler for the Iron Cross, First Class. The recommendation is turned down, but Hitler is instead decorated with the second-class award, prompting him again to write to Herr Popp, this time with news of the happiest day of his life. "Unfortunately, my comrades who also earned it are mostly all dead." He asks Popp to save newspaper reports of the battle. He is promoted to the rank of corporal and begins his duties as an orderly, a position he holds throughout the four years of the war. His job is to take dispatches from regimental headquarters to the soldiers in the front line. It is a perilous assignment, not only because it involves crossing open land, either by bicycle or on foot, and, unlike the men in the trenches, unprotected by any cover, but also because he is an important target for the enemy. The dangers faced by dispatch runners pale in comparison with those of assault troops, who rush forward across no-man's-land to break into enemy positions, but are considerable nonetheless; Kershaw reports that three of the eight runners attached to the regimental staff were killed and another wounded in a confrontation with French troops on November 15. Where possible, dispatches are sent via two runners, increasing the chances of their reaching the lines. But death is not just in the trenches or between the lines; shells burst everywhere and at any time, in the camps to which the men withdraw for rest, in villages kilometers behind the front and in the various makeshift headquarters that are the domain of the highest-ranking officers.

Of all the depictions of the war in the trenches, Ernst Jünger's Storm of Steel is the most closely detailed and therefore also the most appalling, alongside the Englishman Robert Graves's Goodbye to All That, which provides a view from the other side. Jünger describes everything at eye level, from the moment he arrives at the front until he leaves it again four years later, and the sense of chaos is never absent from his account; this is a world devoid of any privileged vantage point, a disordered, tumultuous world in which lives are reaped by the minute.

Joining the front in Flanders in December 1914, Jünger is oblivious to what lies ahead, and the eyes by which he sees become ours. His company base is a staging point, Orainville, a village of some fifty houses grouped around a château in parkland. Wide-eyed, he observes the hectic comings and goings of ragged soldiers with weather-beaten faces, the glowing field kitchen with its smell of pea soup, men jingling their mess tins as they wait to eat. He spends the first night in a barn, eating breakfast the next day in a school building, when suddenly they hear a series of dull concussions. The more experienced soldiers rush out, those just arrived follow them without knowing why. There is a curious fluttering and whooshing sound above their heads, those around him cower or fling themselves to the ground. "The whole thing struck me as faintly ridiculous," he writes, "in the way of seeing people doing things one doesn't properly understand." Immediately afterward he sees dark figures emerge onto the empty village street, carrying black bundles on canvas stretchers. "I stared, with a queasy feeling of unreality, at a blood-spattered form with a strangely contorted leg hanging loosely down, wailing 'Help! Help!' as if sudden death still had him by the throat."

This takes place far from the enemy lines, at a place for recreation and rest, and it is Jünger's first experience of the war.

> It was all so strange, so impersonal. We had barely begun to think about the enemy, that mysterious, treacherous being somewhere. This event, so far beyond anything we had experienced, made such a powerful impression on us that it was difficult to understand what had happened. It was like a ghostly manifestation in broad daylight.
> A shell had burst high up over the château entrance, and had hurled a cloud of stone and debris into the gateway, just as the occupants, alerted by the first shots, were rushing out. There were thirteen fatalities, including Gebhard, the music master, whom I remembered well from the promenade concerts in Hanover . . . The road was reddened with pools of gore; riddled helmets and > sword belts lay around. The heavy iron château gate was shredded and pierced by the impact of the explosive, the curbstone was spattered with blood. My eyes were drawn to the place as if by a magnet; and a profound change went through me.

They are moved to the trenches, where life between the fighting is cold, wet, muddy, sleepless, marked by routine, harsh and dull. In a stream only a stone's throw away lie the irretrievable, rotting corpses of soldiers from a French colonial regiment, their skin turned to parchment by the water that flows over them. Exhausted and mostly unused to physical work, Jünger and his comrades dig their trenches still deeper, and the merry dueling on flowered meadows has never been more distant. After four months they take part in their first major battle, at Les Éparges. Shells come down with dull thumps in a clump of firs, and when they get to the spot bloody scraps of cloth and flesh hang from the bushes around the crater, "a strange and dreadful sight that put me in mind of the butcher-bird that spikes its prey on thornbushes."

In the ensuing battle Jünger is wounded for the first time. The artillery fire intensifies, flashing about them, clouding the air with the dust and debris of detonation, splitting the ear with its dull clamor. Jünger describes it all as being as distant and peculiar as events on another planet, and he is unable to distinguish between the Germans' own gunnery and the shells of the enemy, everything is a tumultuous confusion, the wounded lie slumped around him, shrieking and wailing, and the reader can vividly imagine this inferno, so utterly detached from the familiar world, and then suddenly he describes happy, ardent birdsong, as if the birds were inspired or even encouraged by the bombardment, and one understands that the battle is being fought in an ordinary forest, on the edges of an ordinary village, in the middle of an ordinary day.

This brief glimmer of everyday life, continuing as before, proceeding according to its own laws and habits, makes clear to us that this is a construction, that the forest, presently set ablaze, the twittering birds, the sun in the sky and the grass in the fields are nature, and that the wave of unprecedented destruction that takes place within it is civilization, regardless of the savage and primitive gash it gouges in those who fight, regardless of how blind the rain of metal lashing down.

Men have come together at this place, on each side of a hypothetical line, an invisible chalk mark, in this theatrical distortion of reality in which the familiar is uprooted and life removed to its furthest limit, so relentlessly transgressed, as if they were the gods themselves, since what awaits beyond, on the other side, is death, which is to say nature. The existence of an inside the war, in which lives are emptied out into the void, and an outside the war, in which lives go on as before, together with the mechanization of weaponry, something that further cements the link between war and culture, the large-scale industrialization and modernization of ways of killing, reinforces this impression. Trains crammed with living bodies are sent in, the bodies are destroyed, buried, new trains with new living bodies follow in their wake, their bodies too are destroyed, buried. Some eight million living bodies perish in this celebration of death beneath the persistent sun.

In a way, this is the zenith. For nothing is more precious than life, and here it falls to the ground like hail in a storm. Clearly it is a sacrifice of unprecedented dimensions, but for what purpose? The birds inhabit a world that to them is complete, a repertoire of actions they must carry out every day, throughout their every year, in an interplay of events and instincts with no other significance than keeping them alive, sustaining them in their state of existence. They see the world, and they are familiar with it, though only as effect, not as cause. The sun is warm, the rain is wet, the air consists of various strata through which they fly. They are locked inside their birdness, through which the world appears to them.

That we should similarly be locked inside our humanness has always been a natural thought, our religions issue from it and seek to define what is beyond, that which is concealed from us yet visible in its effects, and they do so in images that simplify for us what we feel to be complex. None of these images is useful here. No god descends from on high to appear before them in the clamor of their war, no only begotten son to whose heaven death is the entrance. The only things here that are not human are the burning trees, the stream running through the forest and fields, the birds sitting on their branches in song, their calls and sorrowless ardor, heard perhaps through a sudden lull in the thunder of cannon.

And then Jünger is hit in the thigh by a sliver of shrapnel, his blood begins to trickle, he drops his haversack and runs to the trench, the wounded from the shelled woods converging on the same place from all sides, the pattern of a star.

The trench is appalling, he flees to a nearby copse, where he is found after some hours and taken to a hospital in Heidelberg. After two weeks of convalescence, he visits home for a short period of leave before being sent to the front again.

He was twenty years old and had gone to war almost straight from school. What he saw and experienced there, the immense battles in particular, like the most violent forces of nature, was so radically removed from ordinary life as to alter forever his outlook on the quotidian. What Jünger saw in World War I was so powerful that it must have been impossible for him to think of it in terms of a haphazard occurrence, an expression of some peripheral idiosyncrasy of the human being, an accident, arbitrary and exceptional. On the contrary, in the years of war he found himself at the very core of the human, with all its exterior fallen away and only the simplest and most basic elements remaining: life and death. That he should have experienced things in this way is not hard to understand in view of the fact that one minute he was a nineteen-year-old living in a world of friends and family, school and literature, an occasional and fleeting romantic infatuation, a chess-playing father who whistled Mozart in the bath and a mother who read Ibsen and had actually met him, and who took her children on pilgrimages to Goethe's Weimar; while the next minute he was in a world of military camps, mud, cold, hunger, exhaustion, and abrupt death, beneath a sky filled with fire and metal. The first of these worlds had contained the second, in the shape of the wars he had read and heard about, but German culture was as classical as it was militaristic, so a nineteen-year-old such as he would be familiar with Homer and Caesar, as well as with Napoleon and the German generals of the war with France in 1870, whereas the second world, that of the trenches, did not contain the first. Storm of Steel does not concern itself with the superstructures of war, neither the most primary structures, which is to say the political structures that determined it all, the very reason they were there fighting, nor the militaristic structures that directed them here and there, but only with his own tangible experiences, the things he sees and feels himself. He's the one who must make the decision to get to his feet and stumble out into the hail of fire; no state, no army, no kaiser, no general can do so on his behalf. And he's the one who is hit in the chest, whose mouth fills with blood as he stumbles into a crater certain he will die, filled by an intense feeling of happiness amid the inferno of explosions, artillery fire, battle cries, and shrieks of terror. What he sees is in the same way connected to him, in the sense that it is he who has to understand it, give meaning to it, or deprive it of meaning. Death is the background from which life emerges. Had death not existed, we would never have known what life was. War is the only activity contrived by man that consciously approaches the line between them. If the processes that lead to war are a scheme, war itself is not, for death is absolute.

Death is not modern.

By our thoughts we try to release ourselves from that fundamental, inevitable circumstance, an endeavor short-circuited by our own demise. In all the efforts of our mind to extricate ourselves from the fact of death, our yearning toward heaven and a life beyond our own, which finds expression so variously depending on the age and culture in which we live, death is ever present. As indeed is the heart, for like death the heart is always the same. The heart is not modern either. It is neither reasonable nor unreasonable, neither rational nor irrational. The heart beats, and then it does not. That's it.

This is the insight of war. All existential thought, any quest toward authenticity, stems from here. The occurrence of death opens up a new reality within our preexisting reality. It is our existential circumstance, and yet we seek to conceal the gate that is opened by death. Not so in war. In war the gate is opened and opened again, everywhere. Eventually the living become used to it, death becomes the norm, opening itself anywhere and at any time. Within this zone it is as if the distinction between the living and the dead shrinks, consisting in little but the fact of the living being animate and the dead not, the living by way of their animation being free in respect to the earth, while the dead have so to speak become bound to it and are ground down into it, little by little.

At the time of writing, it is ninety-seven years since World War I began. Considered from such distance it is a war that appears utterly senseless. World War II does not, being essentially a war of defense against Nazism. But what was World War I about? Politically it was meaningless, there being nothing to make real enemies of Britain and Germany, nothing for which they should fight, on the contrary, they had everything to gain by cooperation. Territorially it was meaningless, since nothing was conquered, and even if one of the countries concerned had broken through and conquered the other, it would have been hard put to find any benefit; what would Britain have done with Germany, or Germany with Britain? As such, it was quite as meaningless in human terms too; those who gave their lives did so for nothing.

This meaninglessness exists in the superstructures, whereas in the nearness of the soldier's everyday life zones of meaning arise, so vivid as to demolish any question concerning the war's justification or the legitimacy of its carnage. Jünger sees three things in the war. The first is the archaic, the immutability of man, Homer's sun, whose logical conclusion is death and whose notion is universal and extrahuman. The second consists of the values on which soldiers depend for survival, such as courage, will, and endurance, what could be called the life force, perhaps a universal property of man, but a mere potential of the single person and thereby in itself individual. The third consists of the new machines, the mechanical means that have now increasingly taken over the conduct of war, which are an expression of civilization.

It, I, we/they.

These are the fundamental elements of life, which from their hiding place in the complexity of civilization emerge in the simplicity of war, and which, by virtue of their concerning the most essential, must be acknowledged. If instead they are suppressed, life becomes nonlife, an escape from life's very foundation, as essential as it is grave. Why would anyone wish to escape from the circumstance of existence, one might wonder, why would anyone choose the nonessential? The reason is that the price is such a heavy one to pay. If we accord the highest value to the life of the individual, if we understand life to be a quantitative concept that must be maintained for as long as possible, then death is our foremost enemy and war becomes absolutely meaningless, absolutely undesirable. If we do not accord the highest value to the life of the individual, but to some element of that life, a property, or to something outside it, an idea, then we consider life as something qualitative, something more than the sum of cells and living days, in other words, we hold that there is something more hallowed than life, and then the equation is simple and one might choose to die for it.

But what could be more hallowed than the life of the individual? The life of the all, or one's own all, one might surmise, this being the legitimization of the majority of wars. Nonetheless, it is an abstraction, and must surely mean nothing in the instant of rising to one's feet to charge forward into a hail of bullets.

To commence an assault on enemy trenches as one's comrades are falling before one's eyes would seem inconceivable on the basis of some abstract notion of collective benefit. In the first edition of Jünger's memoir there is little mention of patriotism and none at all of defending any other grand notion. In the second edition the author has added some lines toward the end where he is sitting on a train on his way to Germany after his war has come to an end, and here he has "the sorrowful and proud feeling of being bound to the land more intimately for the blood shed in battle for its greatness," and moreover, according to his biographer Nevin, is filled with the sense that "Life has deeper meaning only through sacrifice for an idea, and that there are ideals compared to which an individual's life or even a people's count for nothing." This second edition ends with the exclamation, "Germany lives and shall never go under!" All this is gone in the third edition, published in 1934; nationalistic rhetoric had become the property of the Nazis, and Jünger wished not to be associated with them. What remains is that the war as an expression of an essentially internal state: "The true springs of war are deep within us, and all that's atrocious, occasionally flooding the world, is only a mirror image of the human soul."

Mein Kampf was written in 1923, in the Great War's shadow, and is impossible to understand without this being taken into account. There was not a single family in Germany left unaffected, no one who had not lost a son, a brother, an uncle, a neighbor, a colleague, or a friend. Their grief was invisible, yet it touched everyone. Visible were the war invalids, hundreds of thousands of them, faces on the streets with cheekbones shot to pieces, bodies without arms or legs, eyes flaring in terror at any sudden noise, any abrupt movement, profoundly confused men in loud conversation with themselves. Those who had survived brought back with them experiences that could only be shared with others who had been there too, for what they had lived through defied words. What they had witnessed left its mark on them for life, not merely in the form of darkness or the shadowy, suppressed images that came over them in dreams or when least expected in their waking hours, but also with respect to the way they related to their surroundings after they got back. A person who has seen others die by the hundreds over a number of years sees life differently. The dead were not anonymous, they were people one had lived with and lived among, whose lives and suffering one had shared in that tight-knit social sphere, the close bonding that comes of war; perhaps you had shown them photos of your loved ones, they were your comrades, and one by one they fell, abruptly and arbitrarily. To anyone who has been through that experience the attachment of human relationships can never be the same again, for even if you know death is no longer likely to strike like a lightning bolt from the sky, the experience of losing a friend in the space of a split second, and of knowing that it can happen again to any other friend at any moment, and moreover to oneself too, is so fundamental that it cannot be erased, not even by an entire lifetime of peace. In such instances people become withdrawn, there being simply too much to lose. This inner disablement, this emotional paralysis, was as invisible as the grief of the sufferers' parents, it was never talked about, and yet it was there, the catastrophe all too great, all too brutal not to leave those who had been through it scarred for life. To the generation born between 1880 and 1900, World War I was the single overriding event of their lives, and the question they asked themselves when it was over was why it had occurred at all. Millions of young men had perished, but for what? For this? For entertainment, cabaret, cinema, self-indulgent art? Had they given up their lives for such systematized emptiness? Was this what they had fought for? This is the way Hitler saw it, and he was not alone.

They had been to the very perimeter of life, inhabited the borderland between all and nothing, and the intensity that had saturated them there, the carnage they had witnessed, could never be meaningless or empty, could never be nothing; this they knew above all. From a political perspective the possible consequences were basically twofold: never again could there be such an appalling and meaningless waste of human life, or else a new war would render meaningful the sacrifice of those two million German soldiers. To Hitler, only the second of these possibilities was real. For if everything that had gone before the war had been reduced to nothing by it, then the same would hold for the war to come:

> Thousands of years may pass, but never will it be possible to speak of heroism without mentioning the German army and the World War. Then from the veil of the past the iron front of the gray steel helmet will emerge, unwavering and unflinching, an immortal monument. As long as there are Germans alive, they will remember that these men were sons of their nation.

It is this, the mythology of war, the Wagnerian or Homerian tale of heroism from the depths of time, that Hitler knew and cultivated, this was his condensation of meaning, and it was this to which he aspired, not only in relation to the war, but in relation to everything in his time, which from that perspective, in the great, echoing chambers of the past, became hallowed and was accorded unity and cohesion, which is the same as meaning. Certainly, that meaning was absent from the war to anyone who had fought in it, for the war was anything but the expression of unity and cohesion, yet there is no reason to believe that Hitler was being calculating in describing it the way he did, and every reason to believe he did indeed experience the war as profoundly meaningful. He risked his life for what he believed in, and did so as part of a great community that provided him with arbitrary comradeship with no obligations as to close friendship or intimacy in a situation in which all were fighting for the German nation, to which ever since childhood he had dreamed of belonging, and also – at least if we are to believe those passages in Mein Kampf where he writes about the impression left on him by reading his father's book about the Franco-German War of 1870–1 – of fighting for.

This mythologization of war is no dream of war but an essentialization, and the fact of it offering not a glimpse of its everyday reality is typical of the romantic I, the inner being's exaltation of the external, something Hölderlin's poems in particular express rather strikingly, they too being devoid of quotidian triviality, elevating and exalting, saturated with existence, always bordering on the ecstatic, the way life is when charged to the brim with meaning. Romantic infatuation, the state of being in love, can charge up a life in such a way, as the mystical-religious experience can too, and death as well. All three states of being have to do with the transcending of the I. The sense of there being something close to divine in Hölderlin's poetry has to do with the same thing, any distinction between the world and the I all but absent, the poem being almost one with its evocations of deep, green shadows and baking-hot sun, thunder rolling in over the high ground, rivers gushing ice-cold from the mountains, everything being significant and meaningful: the identity of the I and the world is the ultimate meaning. If no such identity exists, the world becomes alien, and before the alien the I stands isolated and detached, as if expelled, alien moreover unto itself and its surroundings. This is what the second creation narrative concerns, the fall that knowledge entails being a fall into the alien. The yearning for nature and the natural is a yearning for identity, unity, the absolute meaning of oneness. The Romantic period's solitary I with its longing to transcend the self is an expression of the same thing, following directly from the dissolution of the religious view of the world, after which only the human remained.

The young Karl Marx's notion of alienation is existential rather than political; only later would it be linked with the specific and mechanical nature of labor under capitalism. Wagner's tales of heroism, his great storms of emotion, are to do with the same thing, exaltation and the transcending of the self. The I of Mein Kampf expresses itself in terms of the same model, elevating war and the singular life of the self to something untainted by the quotidian, a hallowedness meaningful in itself, but unlike Hölderlin, Rilke, Trakl, Wagner, Beethoven, and almost any other German artist of the Romantic and late-Romantic periods, Hitler's I is constrained by its feeble mastery of form, an inability to mold the language into any true expression of the I and the emotions by which it is pervaded, all he can do is seek to copy the formal qualities of others, in the simplest of ways, a cliché. "Then from the veil of the past the iron front of the gray steel helmet will emerge, unwavering and unflinching, an immortal monument," he writes. He is constrained too by his very mind-set, which confines itself to the culture in which he has lived, full of prejudice and approximate insight, half-truths, rumor and generally unreliable assumptions, which, as Hamann demonstrates, surprisingly often is in line with the Viennese newspapers of the day as well as more populist publications, in such a way that what to him appeared grand and meaningful was not depicted as such, in the way of Hölderlin, for instance, but rather as something inauthentic, since the idea of greatness, or the desire for greatness, is the only element of the grand that comes out, this then pointing back to the I and its petty-bourgeois nature, which by its very presence disqualifies any quest for the sublime. Reading Hitler's endeavors toward exaltation in Mein Kampf is like looking at a poor painting of a steep and splendid mountain.

The fact that his prose renders everything small is not to say that Hitler's feelings in respect to the things he described were small, nor indeed that those things in themselves were small. Hitler's talent lay elsewhere, he even underlines this several times in Mein Kampf, the inferiority of writing compared to the spoken word, which he so definitively held in his power and was so adept at exploiting to make his audiences feel what he felt or what he wanted them to feel. In this the mythologization of the essentially quotidian again comes into its own, and the exaltation of a real world in which work, fundamentally dull and monotonous and bleak, becomes heroic and hallowed, and where the past is repeatedly resurrected in parades with horses and medieval banners, in rites and oaths, grand works of architecture reminiscent of Antiquity, a sublime rendering of the present, a reconjuring of society, whose aesthetic elements were largely culled from the world of the military and war: uniforms, ensigns, parades, all unifying. The workers became worker-soldiers, schoolchildren became child-soldiers, sportsmen became athlete-soldiers, and what was unique about it all was that everyday reality was thereby elevated and made significant, not by its interpretation in art, by art's selection of individual constituent parts within it, the world as read in the poem, as heard in music, as seen in the painting, but by the direct and unmediated reshaping and modeling of reality itself. Hitler turned Germany into a theater. What that theater expressed was cohesion, and through cohesion identity, and through identity authenticity. It was not a matter of invention, of constructing an identity by means of costumes, flags, and rallies, but rather of giving expression to something that had always been there, which modern society had held in check and diffused, and this is why so many of its elements came from history: something had been reestablished.

Nor was Hitler a fanatical, militaristic theater director enforcing his will on the people; the strings he played were genuine, the emotions he aroused were in everyone. Anyone who has seen footage of the rallies of Hitler's Germany knows what feelings they evoke, the sheer might of the uniformed, I-less community, the strength of the collective, and oh, how one might long to be a part of such a we. Some of the images of the age express an almost savage beauty, the endless ranks of soldiers viewed at eye level, a sea of steel helmets extending into the beyond, totally symmetrical, the same human being repeated and repeated as if into infinity itself. Or the hush as Hitler walks the several hundred meters toward the burning flame beneath the monument to honor the fallen, surrounded by thousands of soldiers in rank, uniformed, helmeted, invulnerable. Everything he strove to awaken through the prose of Mein Kampf, and which in that context failed, is accomplished now in these human tableaux. An iron front of gray steel helmets rises before us, awakening the past from its slumbers, and yet they are in the present, they are immortal. As one soldier cries out during the Nuremberg rallies: They did not die! They live on in Germany!

Who would not wish to be a part of something greater than the self? Who would not wish to feel their life to be meaningful? Who would not wish to have something to die for?

The tranquillity, satiety, and calm that fills our lives, or with which we strive to infuse them, our foremost aim being satisfaction, a state in which hardly a cloud smudges the sky, is reminiscent of the life Stefan Zweig describes in his memoir The World of Yesterday, a life that came to such an abrupt end in those days of August 1914. The question we must ask is whether the war was caused by political circumstance and historic, societal factors, unthinkable in our own postwar societies, or whether it came about because of a release of certain forces that have always been present in man, a part of our makeup as human beings, present in every one of us, and which may be released again at any time from now. In that case the only thing we might say with certainty is that it will come in a different way, in a different form, because the form in which it came in 1914, and again in 1939, has now long since been identified and all conceivable outlets blocked. There will be no marching in the streets, no seas of steel helmets on the city squares. Yet in my mind, as I sit here in the spring, in a room in Glemmingebro outside Ystad, the sun pouring onto the greening landscape I have blotted from view by means of a travel rug so as to concentrate on my work, though not without interruption by the children, who run in and out of the house with the same eagerness and joy, the same urge to express themselves and their existence as I remember from my own childhood, while my mother is in the garden weeding the flower beds, Linda at the shop buying food for the Easter dinner, her brother hammering nails into the pent roof that collapsed under the weight of snow in the winter, her mother at work next to him trying to straighten a thick bush that also collapsed at the same time, I can feel a yearning for something else, and that yearning, I assume, must be felt by others too, because surely people of the same culture cannot be so different from one another that an emotion can exist in one person only? I don't know what this yearning represents, but I do know that it does not involve any dissociation from what is here, from that which is mine and in which I live, that's not it at all, there is nothing I despise about any of that, and I realize and understand the value of the unwavering regularity of this existence, and its necessity too. And yet, a yearning. For what?

Or more than a yearning it is perhaps a want. A feeling of something not being here. In the midst of life and the living, as if swathed in the chirping and wing-beating of all the birds building their nests nearby, beneath the sun, surrounded by vegetation in every direction, something is wanting.

Is the want in me?

Am I simply unable to grasp hold of my own time, my own place, to see it the way it is, the way it really is, to know that it is everything, and to be filled with joy by that knowledge? For an entire world opens up inside even the smallest plant one stoops to inspect, a living organism bound up with everything else that is living too, growing on the brink of the dizzying precipice of time at which we too stand. Is it my responsibility to validate that world, to fill it with value? Is that possible? Or is it empty, a simple, ongoing state of serial reproduction, copying itself and copying itself again, on and on into infinity? An emptiness that moreover is the foundation of our own biological reality, our life as human beings? If so, why do we imitate the emptiness of serial life in the culture we create? Should our culture not instead establish difference, which is the stuff of all worth, in which value resides and from which it is released, and thereby of all meaning? Does that meaning not exist? Or is it concealed? Concealed then by what means? Concealed by our social existence, whose differences exist in order to keep in place, not to set free, and which indeed keep us in place within our particular lives, our routine lives, from whose viewpoint the entire world dissolves and becomes the same?

But if this is so, where does the idea come from that it might ever be different? We don't believe in God, which means God does not exist and never did.

If this is so, then he existed only in our human minds, as a kind of existential tool, and what was necessary for that to be meaningful was that the insight of this instrumental aspect should not become conscious. It became so only when material reality was identified as instrumental, and from then on there was no turning back, since meaning precludes the deception of open eyes, faith is to know, and just as they knew that God was real, we know that God is not real. The link with the authentic, which resided in religious ecstasy, was broken because the authentic did not exist; ecstasy too, that fervent emotion of the human, was false, a delusion.

But the sun beats down, the grass grows, the heart pounds in its darkness.

"But the sun beats down, the grass grows, the heart pounds in its darkness."

Why did I write those words?

Such language is hollow. It looks like the language of the Nazis. Yes, the sun is actually beating down, the grass is actually growing, the heart actually pounding in its darkness, but the factuality of these things is not what is significant about their linguistic expression, what is significant is what that language evokes, that the sun, the grass, and the heart are in a way elevated, made to be something more than themselves, as if somehow they become bearers of actual reality. It is the same language that says civilization is detached from our basic urges, our sufferings and the brilliance of genius, whereas the sun, the grass, the blood are connected to the authentic, whose two great expressions are war and art, as Mann wrote in 1914.

This language is hollow, and it became the language of the Nazis, but is it untrue?

Paul Celan's poem was a response to that language, which had destroyed the entire culture. It did not first arise in Mein Kampf, but was gathered and concentrated there and through the author of that book disseminated into an entire society with the aim of turning it completely on its head. Everything that language brought with it we have since discarded. All thoughts of the hallowed, all thoughts of the authentic have been eliminated from our minds. We live our lives surrounded by commercial goods, and spend great swathes of our waking hours in front of screens. We conceal death as best we can. What do we do if out of all this a yearning arises for something else? A more real reality, a more authentic life? Such a yearning would be founded on false precepts because all life is quite as authentic, and the hallowed is a notion belonging to life, not life itself. Yearning toward reality, yearning toward authenticity expresses nothing other than the yearning for meaning, and meaning arises out of cohesion, in the way we are connected to one another and our surroundings. This is the reason I write, trying to explore the connections of which I am a part, and when I feel the pull of the authentic, it becomes another connection I feel compelled to explore. That war and art are related, as Mann wrote in 1914 though of course later dissociated himself from, is something I am convinced of, since both seek the very extremity of existence, which is death, against the backdrop of which life gleams radiant, suddenly precious and inalienable, which is to say meaningful. I have always felt this in art, a powerful sense of meaning, almost always in paintings of the period from the seventeenth century to the end of the nineteenth century, though seldom in modern art, albeit with some shining exceptions, the paintings of Anselm Kiefer, for instance, to which I have always felt a strong sense of connection. But then four years ago, on a trip to Venice, it was as if all of this suddenly fell apart. I was looking at the paintings at the Accademia and found them "saying" nothing to me, as if somehow they belonged to a room outside the one in which I existed. What applied there did not apply here. This felt strange, for death is death, life is life, man is man regardless of culture, was that not how it was supposed to be? We had hurried through the exhibition rooms, the children impatient, though Vanja noted the forbidding gruesomeness of all the skulls, the rearing horses and crucified figures, and when we came out and had found a place to sit at a quiet café with a view of the lagoon, and were drinking our Sprite with ice, I was struck by the thought that what those paintings represented, in their age and beauty, which for so many years I had held so highly and striven in so many ways toward, its allure seeming to me to be not merely necessary, but absolutely vital, was perhaps, when everything boiled down, without worth. Suddenly it felt like a burden we bore, a kind of shadow that had fallen upon us, dead and cold. The beauty of the paintings was the beauty of death, the insight they awoke in us was in what was dead and nothing else.

The same day I saw something utterly sublime and quite different to anything else on that trip. I was out with John in the area surrounding the apartment in which we were staying, walking through the narrow, dark, and damp passages where little bags of rubbish with knots tied in their tops had been left outside every door and clothes had been hung out to dry on washing lines that ran up above between the houses, it was late afternoon and we were approaching the square facing the lagoon where the vaporettos came in, when an enormous ship suddenly appeared above the rooftops, gliding slowly away. We emerged onto the square, from where the sea opened out and the very special light that is always in Venice, under cloud or sun, in autumn as well as in spring and summer, made everything, the walls and roofs of the buildings, the paving stones and the surface of the water, shimmer.

The ship was indeed gigantic, towering above the city, passengers milling on all its decks. A loudspeaker voice blared out tourist information, and the air was a glitter of flashing cameras. Something welled inside me. A shiver ran down my spine.

"Look, John," I said, crouching down beside him. He smiled and nodded, and pointed to one of the many pigeons strutting about the square. "Dah!" he said. I rose to my feet again, looking up once more at the vessel, which was now just far enough away for me to be unable to pick out the features of the faces that filled the decks, all I could see was a blur of human figures and the camera flashes momentarily lighting it all up, and then I turned the stroller around and headed back through the passage to a tiny café where John had a bread roll and I had an espresso.

Why did the sight of a cruise ship send a shiver down my spine? What was it that made me think it so sublime?

In classical aesthetics the sublime lay in the beholding of something that rocked the very foundations of the beholder on account of its magnificent or unfamiliar nature. A volcanic eruption, a sinking ship, a tall and rugged mountain, an event, a state of affairs, or an entity before which the beholder has a distinct sense of feeling small or inconsequential. Beauty, synonymous as far back as Antiquity with proportion and harmony, which is to say something within the scope of human control, was incorporated into the notion of the sublime in the Romantic age, perhaps because the idea of the divine had ceased to be a fulcrum of human existence, something all concepts, all human thinking issued from or strove toward. But the sublime and the divine are two different things, the revelation of nature's alienness is different from the revelation of the nearness of the divine, since the nearness of the divine makes conspicuous not only remoteness, not only the gruesome, nagging realization of nature's blindness and inhumanity, but also the opposite, a promise of cohesion and belonging. A we. The divine, or the holy, indicates the boundaries of this we, at the same time as it accords it meaning, not individually but as a collective, a whole. And the nature of the revelation must also have been radically different, for the experience of the divine or the holy was of something transcending an otherwise regular reality, and one can imagine how terrible and fearful that must have been. To stand before an almighty creation that is neither human nor animal, a creation that conceals itself and yet is present where you stand. Rudolf Otto wrote that religious emotion can fill the soul with almost insane force and endeavored to describe the numinous in all its various phases. The sweeping, tide-like moods of tranquil worship that can pass over into a more set and lasting attitude of the soul, continuing, vibrant and resonant, until at last it dies away, the soul resuming its more profane, everyday, nonreligious mode. The strong, sudden ebullitions of personal piety from the depths of the soul, with spasms and convulsions, leading to the strangest excitements, frenzy, transport, ecstasy. It may sink to almost grisly horror and shuddering. The numinous has its crude and barbaric antecedents, Otto states, which may be developed into something beautiful and pure and glorious. "It may become the hushed trembling and speechless humility of the creature in the presence of – whom or what?"

When I read Rudolf Otto or Mircea Eliade, both of whom circle around the experience of the divine or the holy, in order to gain an understanding of that experience and to define it, and when I read the writings of Christian mysticism or the Church Fathers, pervaded as they are with the rapture of religious excitement, I find myself confronted by something utterly alien to me, which does not occur at all in my life or in the world around me, other than the occasional glimpse offered by TV into some ecstatic religious movement. This weakens an otherwise fundamental conviction of mine that says the emotional life of the human is constant, that the feelings that stream through us have always streamed through all human beings, and that this is the reason why it makes sense for us to consider even the oldest works of art, or to read even the oldest texts of literature. To be human has forever been the same, I tell myself, quite independently of the ways in which our cultures have evolved. But the kinds of experience that were once the most important of all, meditations on God and the divine, holy rituals and cults, visions and raptures occurring in lives wholly devoted to God and the divine mystery, this resolve to seek meaning, this fervor, with all its spectra of intuitions, moods, and emotions, is no longer sought or, if it is, then only on the peripheries of society, outside our field of vision, perhaps occasionally evoked in respect to some odd and obsolete phenomenon in TV entertainment: So, you're a monk? What's it like not having sex? When we closed the door on religion, we closed the door on something inside ourselves as well. Not only did the holy vanish from our lives, all the powerful emotions associated with it vanished too. The idea of the sublime is a faint echo of our experience of the holy, without the mystery. The yearning and the melancholy expressed in Romantic art is a yearning back to this, a mourning of its loss. This at least is how I interpret my own attraction to the Romantic in art, the short yet intense bursts of emotion it can discharge in my soul, the sudden swell of joy and grief that can arch up inside me like a sky if I happen to encounter something unexpected or something commonplace in an unexpected way.

A cruise ship thick with people, an industrial landscape mantled by snow, the red sun that illuminates it through a curtain of mist. An old man in blue overalls tossing a cardboard box onto a bonfire, this too in a landscape of snow in which all is still apart from the old man's movements, with which I am so familiar, he being my mother's father, and the fire's cautiously flickering flame. The flame, the fire, what else is this but something opening into the world? Something that occurs is here and then gone? Always and yet never the same. When I see the image in my mind's eye I am transported there, and with all my being I become aware not only of my own existence, but of my own self. For a brief moment it floods my consciousness, and in those few moments I am quite oblivious to my own problems, the things I have done or need to do, the people I know, have known or will know in the future, and everything that connects me to the social world is gone. For five seconds, perhaps, or ten, maybe even for as long as thirty seconds, I exist in that state, in the midst of the world, watching a bonfire burn and a man step back from it in a soundless, snow-covered landscape, and then it is gone, the magic broken, and everything is as it was before, me included.

But so small and insignificant that experience is compared to the rapture of the mystics, so sad my own quest for meaning, forever interrupted, compared to their lifelong devotion, so pathetic my rituals in front of the television screen, compared to those that once took place in the world. Oh, I can hardly bear to speak of it, the difference between the stirring emotions that run through me when a Norwegian skier wins the world championship, and those that run through a person kneeling before the holy itself, whose soul is elevated by that experience.

Oh, for crying out loud, what do I even know of the divine? What gives me the right to even use the term? I, a secularized man of the West, forty years old, as naïve as he is unschooled, one of the world's multitude of unspiritual and unremarkable individuals? Did I not seat myself, two days after seeing the cruise ship, at a Venetian sidewalk café and drop my fork on the ground, prompting the waiter to bring me a clean one, which I declined – no, it's all right, I've got one here, look – oblivious to the context of my fork having been on the ground, for which reason it was to the waiter's mind dirty and unusable? Indeed I did, and in the company of Espen and Anne to boot, who smiled overbearingly before Espen hesitantly suggested that the waiter might have wanted to give me a clean fork because mine had been on the ground and was dirty. How could such a clumsy creature even contemplate letting a phrase such as "the divine" pass his lips? A man who moreover did not believe there to be a God, nor that Jesus was the son of that God; why in all the world should he poke about in such matters?

What was I even looking for?

Meaning. Most likely it was that simple. In my day-to-day life I was filled by a sense of loathing, quite bearable, never threatening or destructive in any way, most of all a kind of shadow that blanketed my existence, the logical conclusion of which was what might be described as a passive yearning for death, so on a plane, for instance, I could find myself thinking I wouldn't care if it crashed, though I could never dream of ever actively doing anything that would put my life at risk. In this state of loathing, meaning could detonate inside me. It would be as if I were suddenly brought to the threshold of something radically significant into which I was then absorbed, only to be expelled again. As if the meaning I was looking for was there all the time, and what kept me from it was me and my way of seeing things.

Was that it? Was there something out there, something objectively true and real, a constancy of life and the living, there always, to which I only seldom, hardly ever, had access? Or was it just something inside me?

I could have kneeled, put my hands together and directed trembling prayers and lamentations to God, Our Father, but I was living in the wrong age, for when I looked up toward the sky all I saw was a vast and empty space. And when I looked around me I saw a society we had fully and completely organized to lull us all to sleep, to make us think about something else, to entertain us. The quick and easy, the soft and comfy, that was what we wanted, and it was what we got. The only remaining space where life was taken seriously was art. In art I looked only for such fullness of being. Beauty and fullness of being. On occasion I found it, and when I did it consumed me, yet the experience led to nothing, was perhaps nothing but the projections of an overtense soul, little lightning flashes in the darkness of the mind.

I see a cruise ship thick with people gliding past, high above the rooftops of an ancient, sinking city, and a shiver goes down my spine. So what? Is that all?

James Joyce, brought up in Catholicism, familiar with the great Fathers of the Church, typically for him called such moments epiphanies, a word originally used to denote the revelation of the divine nature of Christ to the three wise men that starry night in Bethlehem, but which for him stood for the worldly revelations of life in the streets around him. In his sketchy, unfinished novel Stephen Hero, he defines epiphany as "a sudden spiritual manifestation." Joyce takes as his point of departure here Thomas Aquinas's definition of beauty, or what is required for beauty in any object, yet shifts the focus from the properties of the object itself to our own perceptions of them. This is a three-stage operation: first, the object must be lifted away from everything else, and then we perceive it as a thing (Aquinas's "integrity"); then it must be analyzed, considered in whole and in part, in relation to itself and to other objects, the mind recognizing then that it is indeed a thing (Aquinas's "wholeness"); finally, and this is the moment of epiphany, we recognize that the object is one integral thing, that it is that thing (Aquinas's "radiance").

Joyce calls this the soul of the object, its whatness.

The starting point for this reflection, which Stephen details in a conversation with his friend Cranly, is a little intermezzo he witnesses one evening in Eccles Street, where a young lady was standing on the steps of a house and a young man was leaning on the rusty railings below:

> The Young Lady – (drawling discreetly) . . . O, yes . . . I was . . . at the . . . ch . . . pel
> The Young Gentleman – (inaudibly) . . . I . . . (again inaudibly) . . . I . . .

To apply a concept denoting the revelation of the divinity of Christ to such a mundane occurrence as this is blasphemy, the distance between the two domains being as great as it is, yet there is surely an equally great distance between the occurrence and the scholarly aesthetic into which Joyce lifts it up, making fun of the gap between reality and its academic interpretation, at the same time as he is without doubt circling in on something important concerning his own aesthetic. What he is describing is the mundane, everyday world as we know it, and what he wants to probe into are the things going on around him here and now, for everything is local, to everyone, for all time. But in Joyce's epiphanies there is nothing else, this is what characterizes them, they are an expression of themselves only, and the author's task is to view them in exactly that way, in their own right. The examples he cites of epiphanies are certain modes of expression that crop up in conversation, certain ways of gesticulating, certain thoughts that pass through the mind, in other words, fully and completely attached to the human sphere, more particularly to our social existence, life the way we live it in relation to ourselves and to one another. There is something almost anti-essentialist about his aesthetic, so unconcerned with the authentic and indeed the transcendental, seeking all meaning and significance in the river of movement and language that flows through our lives each day. The language in which he captures this is itself a river, and like all rivers it has a surface, that part of it that first catches our eye, and below the surface its depth, words beneath the words, sentences beneath the sentences, movements beneath the movements, characters beneath the characters. Everything in Ulysses is moreover always something else, not because the world is relative, but because the language through which we see it is. The transcendency of Ulysses lies in the language, it opens up a chasm in the now, which is thereby no longer epiphanic – neither isolated, whole, nor particular – and if Joyce's portrayal of the world is true in its relativity and in its massive intertextuality, it is then cerebral and at root scholarly in its determination toward systematics and cohesion, hurtling away from physical reality and the realistic novel, much as the medieval Church Fathers detached themselves from the Bible and the concrete, action-oriented, physical reality found in it, and arced into the hugely abstract, bodiless canopy of speculation and reflection they stretched out over their lives. In that one may lose oneself, as one may lose oneself in Ulysses and the other great works of modernism, with all the intellectual enjoyment and aesthetic pleasure they have to offer, for their turning toward form and language makes them all the more works in their own right, something in themselves, at the same time as they have so plainly lost something too, for as Henry James once suggested, in art, the emotions are the meaning.

To those who consider art from that perspective, form means nothing in itself, possessing meaning only as the bearer of something else, and modernism, which is to say most of what has taken place in art from the beginning of the last century to the present day, has abandoned that dimension. The work of those who do not consider art in that way is tinged with the Romantic. Hermann Broch, for instance, in his Death of Virgil, one of the most hardcore modernist novels of the nineteenth century, whose opening, in which the dying Virgil is lying in a boat on its way into a Roman harbor, contains one of the finest sentences of prose written in Europe during the last two hundred years:

> Steel-blue and light, ruffled by a soft, scarcely perceptible crosswind, the waves of the Adriatic streamed against an Imperial squadron as it steered toward the harbor of Brundisium, the flat hills of the Calabrian coast coming gradually nearer on the left, and here, as the sunny, yet deathly loneliness of the sea changed with the peaceful stir of friendly human activity, where the channel, softly enhanced by the proximity of human life and human living, was populated by all sorts of craft – by some that were also approaching the harbor, by others heading out to sea and by the ubiquitous brown-sailed fishing boats already setting out for the evening catch from the little breakwaters which protected the many villages and settlements along the white-sprayed coast – here the water had become mirror-smooth; mother-of-pearl spread over the open shell of heaven, evening came on, and the pungence of wood fires was carried from the hearths whenever a sound of life, a hammering or a summons, was blown over from the shore.

A singular joy comes over me every time I read this. It is sublime. But why? What is it about this passage in particular that can give rise to such strong emotions? What the sentence describes, a boat entering a harbor one late afternoon, is trivial and recognizably commonplace, at least to anyone who grew up near the sea, at the same time as it takes place in Ancient Greece, to us a lost and unreachable world. Is that why? The interplay of the general, true of any harbor, and the specific, true only of this harbor, long since lost. Yes, this does give me joy, awakening personal memories of the smells, the sounds, the light, and not least the gusting wind as the sun moves slowly across the sky, the way it can fill a person with its thriftless extravagance, but it is not sublime. The sublime comes not from familiarity, but from the opposite. The sublime in this passage is the movement from the sea toward the land, "here, as the sunny, yet deathly loneliness of the sea changed with the peaceful stir of friendly human activity."

The sunny, yet deathly loneliness of the sea – I have never thought about the sea like this, and yet I must have felt it because when I read those words something inside me, faintly, as if from some remote distance, recognizes what they are saying to me. It is a recognition of something whose more exact nature has eluded me. And a recognition of the vast and to us unknown quantity that is death. The transition from there toward the peaceful stir of human activity is what the sentence describes, and what it detaches, because besides applying there, in Broch's imaginary scene at the harbor in Brindisi some time in the last century BC, as well as in the physical reality the sentence evokes, it also applies to the place in which I am seated at this moment, on June 2, 2010, at one minute past four in the afternoon, in the study of this sixth-floor apartment on the Triangeln Square in Malmö, the stir of human activity all around me, which is to say the traffic going past on the roads outside, the people on the street below, their occasional shouts and cries, the blaring horns of this year's high-school graduates on their parade, their music systems thumping and pounding as they make another tour of the city, the elderly black saxophonist sitting leaned up against a pillar, playing the same piece over and over again. This stir of human activity, which is the social world, is what we approach in the opening scene of The Death of Virgil, sailing toward it in anticipation of entering into and becoming a part of it, and as long as we see it in this way, as something gradually emerging before us, so far only in the form of sounds and smells, we see it for what it is, which is to say a haven. During the time Broch was writing about, people were few in number, towns and cultures were separated by great distances, and crossing the divides between them was a slow and perilous business. Everything has changed now, and the stir of human activity, our haven from an indifferent and mortal universe, is no longer local and constrained, but exists wherever we care to look, no longer is something we leave and approach, but something that's all around us, all the time, regardless of where we are or what we are doing. This does not mean that the circumstances of life have changed from that time, only our perception of them. This is why Broch's opening passage has such a powerful effect, since it directs attention toward a fundamental circumstance we increasingly tend to ignore. That it does so in such a simple way, by relating it to a physical landscape in the world, to a particular moment, an early evening outside the harbor in Brindisi, the elements of which, the steel-blue sea blushed by the sun, the rose-colored tinge of the sky, the white-sprayed coast, the glittering houses there, bringing forth similar recollections from the depths of the reader's memory, means that the moment and its potential for creating awareness become something experienced. An experience is what is seen, colored by emotion. Reason ignores emotion, addressing only the mind, but to the mind the fact of endless numbers of people having lived and died before us, and the fact that we who are alive now will also soon be dead, is a banal insight, something we have known since we were five years old. Only by experience, by feeling the gaping void in even the most trivial of surroundings, do we grasp it. Only then does it become an insight. This insight is to all intents and purposes inarticulable, so vast is its content. Since it is so fundamental, so completely central to our lives, Broch could naturally have produced reams on the subject, discussing numerous aspects of death in nature and the havens we make to safeguard ourselves from it, but he wrote this when he was at the height of his career, keenly aware that what the text says in words and what those words awaken in the reader are two different things. He wrote about the sea with only the merest intimation of death, and about the peaceful stir of human activity toward which a boat slowly came drifting, so simply as to allow us to see each element for what it is, and with such meticulous concretion as to allow the image to pass into the reader's imagination, there to unfold and be fleshed out in the wealth of human mood and emotion.

Day passes toward night, soon we are in our final hour, which is the time of Broch's novel. In the boat immediately after Caesar's lies Virgil, poet of the Aeneid, the mark of death on his brow. He is acutely conscious, sensitive to everything, knowing it will all soon be gone. Day passes toward night, everything blazes up before him one last time. In Nordic mythology the realm of death is Hel, a word deriving from hylja, meaning to hide or cover up, an apt name indeed, since the realm of the dead is beyond our sight, and yet, I think to myself now, it can also mean the opposite, that the world of the living hides from the dead. Only a few weeks before we went to Venice we were in Norway, in Vestland, and besides seeing my mother and having John christened, we drove out one day to visit my cousin Jon Olav, he had bought a summer retreat not far from the place he grew up, a small farm to be more exact, on a ridge above the Flekkefjorden, with some land, a bit of woodland, and a small stretch of coast. We drove there in the morning, one of many gorgeous days that summer, the sky was bright blue, the fellsides lush green, a blaze of dazzling sunlight flooding the landscape. The water in the fjords and rivers glittered, the peaks shimmered with snow, the leaves of the trees winking and fluttering in occasional breaths of wind. Mom drove first with Linda and Heidi in her car, while I followed behind with Vanja and John in the backseat. There was hardly any traffic. The car I was driving was one we had borrowed from my mother's sister Kjellaug, Jon Olav's mother. An old Toyota. After the new driving-school and rental cars I'd been driving it felt like a vehicle from another age, the mechanical twentieth century. It was as if I were seated just above the surface of the road, everything rattled and shook, even the slightest acceleration could be felt. The other cars I had driven were dark and sleek, like something out of a computer game, as if the traffic surrounding us were just a projection on a screen, speed, whether 100, 110, or 130 kilometers an hour, merely numbers on a display. This was something else entirely, and I was enjoying it. We came around a bend in the road and there was a river, cool and green, rapids hurtling over the rock, an effervescence of white. We came through a tunnel, and there was a fjord beneath us, its blue expanse with farms dotted about the shore on one side, steep, treeless fells on the other like slabs of iron in the haze. There were no people anywhere to be seen, only old and sagging structures, the occasional flashy home from the 1980s, agricultural machinery lying around, fields and enclosures, forest, fjords, fells. And Vanja's voice from the backseat:

"How much farther, Daddy?"

"It won't be long now. Just be patient!"

"I'm bored!"

"Look over there, look! A waterfall on the other side!"

"I know, I can see."

"Do you want some music on?"

"Yes."

I put Dennis Wilson on. Vanja calls it car music when we listen to it at home. In the mirror I could see her lean back in her seat and stare out with an empty look in her eyes. John was fast asleep next to her.

We came down into Dale, its two gas stations making it a metropolis in this scarcely populated wide-open place where I had spent so many weeks of summer when I was growing up. On the other side of the town a minute later, the steeply sloping ridge of the esker rose up to our right, crowned by Kjellaug and Magne's farm. Shortly after, as we got out of the car at Jon Olav's place, everything was still. I heard bees, a busy hum wafting back and forth, rising and falling in the quiet air. I opened the door on Vanja's side and unfastened her seat belt, she climbed out and looked up at me. John was still asleep and started to cry when I bent over him and began to extricate him from his belts and buckles, but when I lifted him out he hushed and put his head against my shoulder. The house was set back from the road at the top of a steep meadow running down to the deep-blue fjord, whose waters lapped lazily against the shore. The trees on the other side shimmered.

We were there all day. I dived into the fjord in my underpants as Vanja and Heidi stood and watched me from the rocks, we rowed out in a little boat with Johannes, Jon Olav's eldest son, guiding us, and when the afternoon came I took Vanja fishing with a rod we borrowed. Vanja had never been fishing before, now I had to teach her, and so that she wouldn't be disappointed, neither the weather nor the time of day being especially suited for fishing, I kept telling her we probably weren't going to catch anything. As long as you know, I said. Yes, I know, she said. We pushed through some bushes, picked our way over the rocks, and came onto a little point of land that jutted out into the water, where I cast the spinner. It glittered in the sunlight as it arced through the air and landed with a little splash, and as it sank I handed the rod to Vanja so she could reel it in. Is this right, Daddy? she asked. Yes, that's fine, I said. I've got one! she said. You're joking, I said. A moment later a fine codfish lay flapping at our feet. Your very first cast! I exclaimed, and she beamed with pride. It was the only bite of the day. Back at the house, Linda took a picture of her with the fish in her hands. For once I felt like a real dad. Liv and Jon Olav were busy making dinner, his whole family was coming, Ann Kristin with her two girls, and Magne and Kjellaug. An hour later, as the sun nestled on the treetops to the west, we numbered eight children, five parents, and three grandparents, all of us seated on the slope, each with a plate in our lap, eating sausage stew and rice. On the outside it was just like any other cozy family get-together, but beneath the surface it was a different story. Magne, whom I had known all my life, was terminally ill. He had always been a strong and vigorous man, a focal point in any gathering, a man of immense charisma, impossible to ignore. Sitting there now he was hardly recognizable. Physically he wasn't much changed, but his presence had gone. He was hardly there, and it pained me the whole time, even when he was out of sight, I couldn't grasp it, that such a total transformation could be possible, I'd always equated his presence with him, the person he was, to me they were the same. Now he was a shadow of himself. He chatted a bit, ate a little, occasionally gazing out over the fjord, surrounded by his children and grandchildren, on what was perhaps the most beautiful day of that whole summer.

Everything he saw would soon be gone to him, and would never come back.

Not just his family, whose fates and destinies he would never know, but also the fjord and the fell, the grass and the humming insects. And the sun. He would never see the sun again.

These thoughts tainted everything I saw that day. The beauty of the world became enhanced, and yet it seemed crueler too, for one day it would be gone to me too, and continue to exist for those who remained, as it had done since the beginning of time. How many people had sat where we were sitting and looked at the same view? Generation after generation stretching back in time, all here once, all gone now.

When evening came and it was time to go home, Vanja wanted to go with Heidi and Linda, so I drove with John, who slept, an hour and a half beneath the towering fells, through the valleys where the shadows of approaching night grew long, past the racing rivers and gushing waterfalls, and all the time I sang out loud, drunk on the sun and death.

What else could I do? I was so happy.

It was the same sun Broch had written about in the thirties, the same sun that sank into the sea off Brundisium that evening in the year 19 BC. And it was the same sun Turner let shine upon his picture of an ancient harbor, painted some hundred years before. Turner found his motif in Virgil's epic Aeneid, more specifically in the story of Dido, who falls in love with Aeneas and takes her own life when he parts from her. However, it is not so much the drama of the events Turner is interested in as the place in which they unfold. His painting depicts the harbor at Carthage on the northern coast of Africa and appears markedly Romantic in both its exoticism and its rubble-strewn ruin lust, the many monumental, half-collapsed buildings that fill its canvas. At least this was what I thought the first time I saw it. On closer inspection though, I realized these were not ruins at all, but the opposite. The great chalk-white buildings of Antiquity were actually under construction, and what the painting shows is a city rising rather than falling. It's a splendid painting. On the right of the picture a cliff thick with vegetation drops steeply away to a river, which then opens out into a harbor. On the other side of the river, in the left of the picture, a building is under construction, and below it are some people, figures made small by the imposing cliff and the buildings. A woman in white, Dido, stands in the midst of a group of men, one of whom, seemingly a soldier, is turned away from the beholder, and most likely this is Aeneas. Building materials lie scattered about, and in the background a number of men seem to be at work, hauling something ashore from a boat. A cluster of boys, almost detached from all this activity, are gathered at the water's edge, they are naked and have either just climbed out of the water or are about to jump in. While they may be detached from the goings-on at the riverside, they are not detached from their surroundings, on the contrary, the feeling I get when I look at the picture is that everything seems to hang together, the boys are in some way joined up with the vegetation and the water, with the people behind them and the mighty buildings, and the masts of the boats in the background seem almost to melt into the haze that pervades the activity taking place at the river on this particular day.

While cold light makes everything sharp and separates things out, warm light blurs contours and makes the elements of the scene seep into each other. This was primarily what Turner was interested in, I imagine, since so many of his paintings display this feature, the one of the train, for instance, almost completely blotted out by the snowstorm, hardly a definite line or contour in the picture, everything a blur, everything in flux. Seeing in color, this is what we see, the objects vanishing, or their functions, and the eye that puts aside all it knows, that puts aside all preexisting insight, is the eye that can see the world anew, as if it were emerging before it for the very first time. Turner was interested in the relationship between the inconstant and the immutable, the solid and the fluid, and in that way the train becomes an expression not of anything else, one of the many categories into which it might be placed to do with modernity, industrialism, civilization, and the man-made, but only of what it is in itself, in pure physical terms, an enormous iron object proceeding along an iron track, almost obliterated by the snow, which would obliterate almost any other object in the same way: a sailing ship, a horse-drawn carriage, a funeral procession, a bear. When it comes to Dido Building Carthage, his interest lies similarly in the near endless ways in which light alters the landscape, from its shimmering in the river to the haze that absorbs it into the horizon, and this focus naturally affects the scene unfolding there. Dido is perhaps seeing Aeneas for the first time, something is beginning there, yet something is coming to an end too, for what she sees will soon lead her into death. The fact of there being so little difference between what is built up and what comes crashing down, the fact that the buildings under construction could just as well be ruins, compounds this impression. The tropical vegetation also plays a part, growing so wildly, so blindly and with such vigor as to pose a threat to the civilized world, which by comparison is so neat and orderly as to be reminiscent of death. All this exists in Turner's painting, and yet none of it is central, for its principal motif is the sun.

The first time I saw the painting, which hangs in the National Gallery in London, I was filled with a sense of welling emotion, it was all I could do to remain standing in front of it, so huge was the impression it made on me. This was of course down to its sheer beauty, but also to the way in which the sun is presented, the way it actually dazzles the beholder. The sun is the primary subject, suspended high above the scene, its rays pervading everything, illuminating all surfaces, either directly or indirectly, conjuring forth all colors, warming the air, making it thick and consuming all distinctions, in a way tying the various elements of the scene together, though without any of the people present even being aware of it. How can this be possible, I thought to myself as I stood there. How can they go about beneath something as mighty and immense, such an insanely creative principle, this enormous sphere of gas aflame in the sky, and yet ignore it so completely? They do not see the sun, but Turner did and, thanks to him, we do too. The sun in this painting is so predominant it is hard not to think of it as holy, and that Turner was worshipping it. Indeed, he valued this particular canvas highly, so highly that an early version of his will declared that he wanted to be buried with it. Later he abandoned this bizarre wish, donating it instead to the National Gallery on condition that it be displayed next to a painting by Claude Lorrain, also of an ancient seaport, a picture he greatly admired and on which his own canvas can be taken to comment. And so it came to pass: in Room 15 of the National Gallery, Turner's painting now hangs next to Lorrain's. The similiarities between the two are striking. Both motifs are classical and centered around a female figure – in Lorrain's instance the Queen of Sheba – both are set in a port lined by ancient buildings, far below that which so dominates both canvases: the sun and the sky. But this similarity serves only to make their differences all the more marked and significant. The most obvious of these is that Lorrain's harbor opens out on the sea, whereas in Turner's painting the sea is not visible at all, the harbor all but enclosing the river. And whereas the light in Lorrain's painting is sharp and clear, in Turner's it is thick and always somewhat hazy. This makes the effect of the two canvases quite different. In Turner's, life is hemmed in, there is an inertia about it, in the sense that it rises and falls in the same place, with no way out. This is emphasized by the motif, which on the one hand is death – Dido burying her husband – and on the other, life: Aeneas, the great survivor, has come, and with him love, which is to say the vital force of life and the future, which for Dido, bereaved and emotional as she stands there at the river, is to be her death.

This claustrophobic sense of being hemmed in is essential to the feeling or understanding of life the painting manifests or explores. The sun too is part of this, its static aspect being likewise compounded, and while it may give life to everything, it precipitates decay too. In Lorrain's seaport, depicted some hours later, at evening, the breezy air of passing day blowing in from the sea, everything by contrast appears wide open and in motion. The motif here is the Queen of Sheba's embarkation, but around this event all sorts of other things are going on too, boats putting in and rowing away, sailors clambering up a ship's rigging or leaning against the gunwales, people going about the quayside, pausing to chat, gazing out at the royal vessel or keeping an eye on a scampering child at the water's edge, and all of this with the open, sun-drenched sea stretching out toward the horizon. The majestic pseudoantique buildings, the finely dressed people and the many boats in the harbor in front of them are clear and distinct. This has a particular effect on the main event, the embarkation of the queen, which becomes just one of several things going on, significant to those who are a part of it in that precise location, but nowhere else, paling as one shifts one's gaze outward to the sea or inward to the town. Entities that vanish in the open, existing only locally, are a frequent phenomenon in Lorrain's work.

Recently I visited the Metropolitan Museum in New York, and there was a painting by him entitled The Trojan Women Setting Fire to Their Fleet, another scene from the Aeneid, where this very aspect is perhaps even more pronounced. It shows a war fleet at anchor near the shore, some women are standing with flaming torches, some are in a boat on their way out to the ships, but the intense drama of the scene, its momentousness, seems to be taking place among these people only, while the landscape stretches out beyond, unmarked by these events, submerged in the deep slumber of uneventfulness, and above them is the immutable sky with its still-burning sun. Was it viewed in that way when it was painted, four hundred years ago, in Lorrain's own time? To us the local aspect of any major event is hardly ever present, both because every part of it is focalized and because it is made to exist in all places at once.

No matter where we happened to be on September 11, 2001, we heard about or saw the same thing, the two planes crashing into the twin towers. This event was in all our minds, there was no outside – apart from the place one happened to be, physically, wherever in the world. This bipartite operation, so characteristic of our age, where something is on the one hand almost completely focalized, and on the other almost completely spread out in all directions, was of course unknown in Lorrain's day, the technologically unsophisticated seventeenth century, when an event was for those who happened to be there when it took place. When Lorrain interprets a scene from the Aeneid, he brings it across to us in a way not unlike that of a news photographer in our day and age, as a kind of witness – the fact of the former being a fictive witness, and the latter being an actual witness, makes no difference to the form – but he shows us something more besides, which has to do with the time and space in which the event took place. The great, eventless landscape that surrounds what is going on makes it so obvious to us that it is going on only in the scene's here and now, and that this is the most important, essential, aspect of any event. Oh, how simple and plain an insight, yet it is one thing to know the nature of something, quite another to feel and experience it. How hidden the actual nature of events has become to us is something we understand only when we see something unexpected happen in front of our own eyes. Only then, at such a moment, do we realize how unimaginably few unexpected events unfold in our world, how incredibly systematized and regulated our every movement, even in our largest cities, and, moreover, and this is perhaps the most shocking aspect, the way such an event vanishes again the same moment it occurs.

Some years ago, when we were living in Stockholm and I kept an office on Dalagatan, I was out walking with Linda, we had eaten lunch together, she was on her way home, I wanted to stop at a record store before getting back to work. It was snowing, the street was full of slush, the sky above us gray and leaden. The cars with their yellow headlights and red taillights, their growling engines and swishing wiper blades, the people on the street with their heads bowed to the sidewalk, beneath the vertical faces of the buildings, made the moment a cacophony without my thinking of it in that way, everything was simply how it was supposed to be. Suddenly, something happened, there was a thud, my eyes were drawn to the middle of the road. A car braked, and a man flew through the air above it. He landed heavily on the road surface, and a short distance away a bicycle hit the ground the same moment the car jerked to a halt. The other cars behind it stopped. On both sides of the street pedestrians stood motionless on the sidewalks, eyes fixed on the middle of the road. The man, wearing a thick blue down jacket, sat up slowly. He had a big, bald head. He sat there, looking emptily into space. Blood trickled from his forehead and down his nose. Great flakes of snow whirled in the air around him. The thought occurred to me that I should do something, and I opened my bag to get my phone, but then I saw a young man just in front of us with his own phone pressed to his ear, I heard him say there'd been an accident, so I put mine away again just as the car door opened and a man got out. He crouched down in front of the cyclist, said something to him, gripped him under his arms, helped him up, put him in the front seat of the car, clicked the seat belt into place, slammed the door shut, climbed in behind the wheel, shut his own door, and drove off.

The street had opened like a flower, now it closed again. Apart from the bike, which was still lying there on the road, everything was exactly as before.

The young man on the phone said there was no need for an ambulance after all.

I looked at Linda.

"What happened?" I said.

"I'm not sure," she said. "It all went so fast. I suppose he took him off to the hospital?"

"I suppose so," I said.

The young man swiveled to face us.

"He drove off with him," he said.

"Yes," I said.

"I called an ambulance. No need now, though."

"No," I said.

"He drove straight into him. It was the driver's fault. He might not be taking him to the hospital. He could just leave him somewhere and clear off."

"No, I can't imagine that," I said.

"Why else would he be in such a hurry?" he said, then walked over to the bike and leaned it up against a lamppost, raised his hand to Linda and me in a wave and went off toward the center while we ambled away in the opposite direction. Linda went home, I turned around and went back to the office.

I felt shaken. But why, exactly? There was nothing puzzling about what I had seen, and it was hardly spectacular either. It was a minor accident, that was all, a motorist knocking a cyclist off his bike in busy lunchtime traffic. The next day I checked the paper to see if there was anything about it. There wasn't. Of course there wasn't. Not a word. But still I felt shaken. It wasn't because I felt for him, or because there had been blood, it was something else, something to do with the very nature of the occurrence. Fifty meters away no one knew what had happened, and to the few people who were there it was all over and done with as quickly as it took place. Had there been some mention in the paper, I would probably have calmed back down, order would have been restored. The newspapers are full of that kind of thing, events deviating in some way from the norm, and our reading about them there lends them a kind of fixedness they don't have in real life, where they are over the moment they occur and no one who witnesses them can quite grasp what actually happened. That fixedness is a fiction, but we understand it to be reality, and thereby the real world remains under our control, and this is our haven. The event is lifted out of its physical environment and its particular moment and goes from being without continuity to becoming a part of an ongoing system, so-called news. Anything that cannot be explained, any unexpected accident or catastrophe, any instance of sudden death or incomprehensible malice is gathered here in the form of small narratives, and the mere fact of their being told is sufficient to put us at ease, to assure us that order exists. This system is completely irrational, such order being but fiction, and in this it resembles other systems people have seemingly always sought to establish. Order operates in the social domain but relates to what lies outside that domain. The fear of natural forces, inorganic as well as organic, has always needed to be assuaged, and since the human is what is known to us, and such forces are alien to us, they have been incorporated into the human sphere, still as alien, yet alien within our own domain. The classic trope here is the ghost, death in human form. One of the places where this aspect of the relationship between man and nature is clearest is in the work of the author Olav Duun. One of his most important books is called Menneske og maktene (published in English as Floodtide of Fate), the original Norwegian title evoking the human struggle against the tide of inhuman forces, a theme that runs throughout his work. His masterpiece, the six-volume saga The People of Juvik, is steeped in it. Though Duun was only ten years older than Broch and they wrote and published their novels during the same period, The People of Juvik is so unlike The Death of Virgil that they could be attributed to different civilizations if one did not know any better. Broch's opening scene, with its Imperial Adriatic squadron and the dying Virgil, is worlds away from this:

> The first Juviking they can tell us about came from the south, from Sparbu or Stod or wherever it was. His name was Per. He had been married, it was said, and had had house and land, and he brought his mother with him. What had driven him out the Lord only knew. He leased a piece of land from Lines.

Whereas Broch's novel takes place in the very epicenter of power, with the empire's greatest poet as its main character, and explores the relationships between ethics and aesthetics, politics and literature, Duun's novel is set in the very margins of civilization, a tiny and in every respect insignificant village community on the coast of Nord-Trøndelag in preindustrial Norway, with a family of uneducated farmers and fishermen as its main characters, the political upheavals and transformational occurrences that might take place in the wider world washing up onto their shores only in the aftermath, like historical driftwood. Naturally, this is not the way they see things themselves, to them this is the center of the world, and so closely does Duun zoom in on them that the reader feels this too, following the family's tale as individual existences are established and eked out, a society formed and maintained. Land is cleared and cultivated, houses are built, children are born. This is the foundation of their lives, on which they could stand so firmly if not for the crackling force field that exists between them, the invisible sphere of emotions, jealousy and resentment, love and benevolence, greed and arrogance, suspicion and fathomless naïvety that drives them here and there, lumping together in great knots, dissolving, lumping together, dissolving, and lumping together again. The narrow horizon within which this takes place and the long period of time the saga covers make it seem like it's the place itself that finds expression in its people, as if they are their place more than they are themselves, in contrast to Hamsun – probably the most obvious writer to compare with Duun – in whose work such an idea could never arise. Hamsun's characters are alien, belonging to no place, they are tourists of the mind, somehow, without a past, without origin. Hamsun's characters come barging in. Emotions occur within rather than between individuals, in contrast to Duun. The difference reveals itself too in their understandings of irrationality. Both Duun and Hamsun are interested in the notion. In Hamsun the irrational is often fine and delicate, a reflection of the nobility of the nerves, romantically maniacal, as rich as it is a thing of beauty. In Duun the irrational is bound up with popular belief, superstition, misunderstanding, and darkness, a thing that occurs between people, often helpless and impoverished. When Per Anders, the first of the saga's series of protagonists, dies, Duun describes it like this:

> The maids dared not lie down to sleep that night. They sat downstairs in the parlor and slept. For they heard a braying outside. They heard queer noises in the old house. Ane sat half-covered up in her shawl. She was reading a hymn, or perhaps the Lord's Prayer itself.
> Then he jumps to his feet and listens out: "Hear, the buck!," only to lie down again smiling: "Oh, never mind, it's only the ladder and the birch. They don't frighten me."
> There was something terrible outside the house, this they felt. There sat an evil spirit, riding on the roof. It was a night of ill fortune.
> Per Anders had a dire fit of coughing and rattling of the throat. Then he said: "Come now, Ane. Give me the staff."
> "Pray to the Lord, pray to the Lord!" she whispered anxiously.
> "M-m. If I have never prayed to him before, why – "
> It was the last he said. Ane opened the door, that the soul might depart, and then she laid out the body the way it was supposed to be done. She noticed little Anders standing in the doorway. At the same moment, Valborg saw him too, and both of them asked him: "What are you standing there staring at, Anders?"
> The boy pointed to the foot of the bed. "Who was that man there?"
> "There?" They looked at each other. Their knees trembled. Valborg took the boy and put him to bed.

Death in Duun's writing is shrouded in terror and superstition. They open the door to let out the soul of the deceased, they see a ghost sitting at the foot of the deceased's bed, or perhaps it is the devil himself come to collect him. The next morning they burn the likhalm, the straw on which the corpse has lain on the bier, and when the wind blows the smoke back toward the farmhouse they are gripped with fear, taking it to be an omen of impending death. When the son rings the church bell for the deceased, it feels unusually heavy and sluggish, a bad sign, he lies and tells his mother all went well. The corpse is laid out on straw inside the farmhouse, his hymnbook under his chin and a coin on each eye, one of which slips from its place, the deceased staring at them all, a couple of the women gasping in fear. He lies there a week before the wake and the burial. "The women dared hardly go outside after dusk, they thought they had a white one at their heels wherever they went; and all sorts of ugly noises were to be heard in the evenings." On the day of the wake a crow settles on the roof of the farm, they chase it away, but it keeps coming back; again they take it to be a sign that someone else is soon to die. Yet the deceased makes them think of other things too besides ghosts and spirits. Per Anders's son Per visits the corpse daily.

> It seemed to him like it wanted to tell him something. But when he was there it told him nothing: it slept as before.
> Ay, he thought, here lies the last. Of them.
> And when he came out, he said out loud to himself: "And so the fell ends at the sea. It wants no further. And as death has drawn this face, so does evening lift hills and fells toward the sky: still and stone-dead, so far removed from life and all that lives and moves."

It is the sunset Duun is describing, when evening rises in the landscape and all becomes still and dark. The foreboding of death Broch invests in his glittering sea is effectuated here to the full, though without the landscape losing its beauty. "So does evening lift hills and fells toward the sky." That we are bound up with stillness and the dark, and seemingly become one with them when we die, is the oldest mystery of all, for we are here one moment and gone the next, never to return, but to remain there, blind and still, for all time. The endeavor of Duun's characters is to give voice to this blindness, this stillness, thereby drawing the unknown into the known. The smoke of the likhalm is a sign, it tells them something, The sluggish church bell tells them something. The black crow tells them something. And the corpse, when the coin slips from its eye, tells them something. When this dark and silent world speaks, a path is opened between the living and the dead, which in itself is meaningful. The inexplicable, such as a person in the prime of life, wholly involved in human reality, suddenly being struck down without anyone being able to do anything about it, snatched by death or else spared to recover, makes any occurrence a meaningful sign: the smoke blowing back to the farm, the omen of what was to come. Order exists, nothing in the world is arbitrary. The order Duun describes is a blend of Christianity, paganism, and homespun fatalism, and much of the story's value lies in the way he shows how the great superstructures that exist independently of the people there are adapted to the real-world lives they live, hauled down into praxis, a day-to-day existence of plows, fishing nets, livestock, and outhouses, by which they are changed. In their pure form myths are complete depictions of reality, closed upon themselves, yet the way they work, what they do, resembles what Duun's characters do. Myth lends a face to the unknown, giving it body, place, and time, establishing connections between the human world and nature, between death and life, between past and future, creation and destruction. When a figure such as Odin dangles from the branches of Yggdrasil, half dead and half alive, to obtain its knowledge, or when Eve is coaxed into eating the fruit of the Tree of Knowledge, thereby becoming mortal, in both cases a connection is established between the tree, death, and knowledge. Of what does that connection consist? The roots in the ground, the branches in the sky, these are the world and life, which is endless, forever sprouting anew from dead stubs. Knowledge comes from the dead, everything we know we have learned from them. Life is the life of the one and the life of us all. Death is the death of the one and the death of us all. The sun is forever being seen for the first time, always a new pair of eyes squinting up at it, and forever being seen for the last time, other eyes closing, losing sight of it once and for all. These connections are what our myths and rituals manage and administer, and the same applies to them, they are already there for us. They are a language, a different language, and what they communicate can be communicated in no other way. In this respect the Enlightenment, resting on the idea that myth, ritual, and religion were a form of superstition, represented decay. We call the mythological view of the world unenlightened, and obviously, four hundred years after the beginning of the Enlightenment, we now know more about the material world and how it works than those who lived before that time. And not just more, but unimaginably more. But what is knowing? Throughout the Völuspá, the völva's questions are repeated in what seems like a refrain of reluctance: Do you know enough yet, or what? Knowledge is concealed, connected to Hel, the dead and the past, out of sight, and access to it comes at a price. "Do you know enough yet, or what?" says the völva, and in that lies an evaluation of those listening in, their thirst for knowledge, at which she sneers. To drink from Mimir's Well, Odin sacrifices an eye, quite unthinkably to us, since what we know is so bound up with what we see. For us knowledge comes from sight, this was the essence of the revolution that was the Enlightenment, no longer were we to be tied to the authority of religion's ancient scriptures, the texts of philosophy. In myth this is not the case, in fact the opposite holds, for in myth knowledge is bound up with what we cannot see, that which is secret and concealed. Moreover, the price to be paid for it is great. In the Bible's creation myth the fall of man is down to Adam and Eve eating the fruit of the Tree of Knowledge. "The oldest of our religious traditions considered knowledge to be guilty; we had thought it to be innocent," writes the French philosopher Michel Serres. The rituals, myths, and folktales that have been handed down through the generations, as far back as our collective memory can reach into the dark depths of history, of whose lives we are unknowing, are referred to by Serres as social or cultural technologies, industries that worked to "secrete time," as he puts it, "from whose compost the different traditions appeared." Language, which we take for granted, came once from nothing. The insight that the community lives on even when the individual dies, which we take for granted, came only gradually. Responsibility toward the future, of which they themselves were not a part, was not given but was won. There is a light in this, but it is directed toward what it means to be human, rather than toward the components of the human and how they work together. Our myths see us in terms of time, the Enlightenment sees us in terms of space.

Our world is very much about the space we inhabit, practically all our technology, industry, and science is organized according to its principles. The space we inhabit is seen, mapped, and explained, and subjugated at an increasing rate. The space we used to inhabit, and which Duun describes, characterized by repetition through generations, where people toiled by the sweat of their brows, made love, gave birth to children, and died, in other words the space in which they felt themselves at home, but which they also feared, surrounded as it was by the darkness of ignorance, no remoter to us in time than to be inhabited by the parents of my own grandparents in Vestland, who were fishermen and farmers, is now gone. We do not believe in omens, we do not believe in God, in fact we believe in nothing; instead we know. We know the wind's direction is determined by meteorological phenomena, and that smoke blowing toward a house means nothing other than that, a movement of air caused by differences of atmospheric pressure. We know the soul dies when we die, so we no longer open the door to let it out. We know there are no such things as ghosts, and that devils do not exist either; if a boy sees a figure in the half-light at the foot of the bed, it is a product of his imagination. We know that a sluggish bell cannot determine how the year will proceed. We know birds are not omens; a crow settling on the roof of a house where a person lies dead is a matter of coincidence, the whim of a bird; perhaps the roof gave it a better view of what it was after? Everything has a sensible, rational explanation, we know this and live our lives according to that knowledge. For that reason, we are not afraid of the dark and not afraid of death.

But what do we actually know?

In Duun's world everyone believed in God, this was a matter of course, anything else was unthinkable. But few had any real idea of what it was they actually believed in, few had anything more than a superficial knowledge of religion, that was what the priests were there for, they knew everything there was to know about the Scriptures. For ordinary people it was sufficient to know there was a god, and a son of that god, who took all their sins upon himself, and that there was a life after death. This applies to us too. We know how everything works and hangs together, nothing remains unexplained. Yet few of us know exactly what it is that we know, few are in any way genuinely familiar with the sciences. We know about atoms and electrons, we know about the theory of evolution and the big bang, yet would be hard put to explain any of these things ourselves; as long as we know someone else knows, we trust in that knowledge, that the world is organized in that way, and this puts our minds at ease and makes us feel secure. Duun's world revolved around repetition, time was mythical and static, whereas our world revolves around the new changing times, progress. The new is in everything; the things we use, for example, are continually being redesigned, cutlery made in the eighties is different from cutlery now, a house built in the 1950s is different from a house built in our day, but such change is for the eye only, visual rather than functional: a knife has a handle and a blade in 2010 as it had a handle and a blade in 1710 or 1310. In any mythological understanding of reality the eye does not count, meaning resides in what the eye cannot see, whereas any rational understanding of reality is visual, and that shift, which occurred in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, comprises the very nucleus of the revolution that was the Enlightenment. The most important technologies developed in that age were the telescope and the microscope, without these two optical instruments the gradual insights of science would have been inconceivable. And perhaps the emphasis placed on design in our own age should be understood on that basis? Time is invisible, time can be neither enlarged nor diminished, evading all spatial technologies by virtue of that invisibility, but in design it is captured, in design it appears to us: the seventies looked like this, the eighties looked like this, the nineties looked like this. The old becomes the new in a system that in principle is the same as that of our former rituals, where each spring was a new beginning, though with the important difference that what we see is not the same, we do not see the repetition, only the new. The same is true of news, which removes events from their original time and their original place, inserting them into a flow of other events, the same from one day to the next, from one month to the next, from one year to the next, in that planes will continue to crash, people will continue getting killed, workers will always be on strike somewhere, there will always be car accidents, maritime disasters, elections, famines, and within this continuity, in which individual events are different but the form always the same, time is again static and mythical. Oh, our world is indeed a mythological world, above us a sky of images in which nothing ever changes and everything is the same. We have made a myth of reality, but unlike the people whose lives were determined by a mythological understanding of the world, we are unaware of it, thinking what we see and relate to to be reality itself, the world the way it really is. It is in this light that I understand the experience of the sublime, or the epiphanic, more particularly that something in the world emerges before us, passes through our conception of it and for a brief moment reveals itself the way it is. The things themselves are the same, only our perception of them changes, because in being unusually grand, unexpected, or in some other way departing from the norm, for a few seconds they contrive to put our expectations out of action. This is why Turner's sun, or the event depicted by Lorrain, or the sea and the harbor in Broch's opening passage, appear so intense and awaken such vigorous emotion. This is the truth of art. The truth of science is of a different nature, quite differently bound by time; practically all scientific research of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries is unreadable today, certainly it has lost most of its relevance, whereas the art of that period still speaks to us and is laden with meaning. Indeed, across the chasm of familiar and unfamiliar time it speaks to us; a cave of paintings tens of thousands of years old leaves an impression on us and in a certain respect cannot be surpassed, the same is true of the first creation narratives, even though we know little if anything about those who wrote them or how they lived. Compared to the swell of generations who lived through the hundreds of thousands of years before the advent of Enlightenment philosophy, the ensuing four hundred years of rationality are but a ripple on the surface, a scratch on the rock of a fell, and from such a perspective concepts like "rational" and "irrational" are not particularly fruitful. It is all a matter of different ways of relating to the unknown. We have succeeded in exorcising the unknown, and we are at ease and secure, the first culture in history not to tremble in the face of our circumstances, life is under our control. But the price of such security is high, for it is a presence in our lives. And it reveals itself in death. We are no longer afraid of death, having lifted everything to do with it into the sky of images above us, because if one thing is prevalent there it is the image of people dying. In the world of images people die all the time, they are shot in the head or in the chest, they plunge from cliffs and waterfalls, they drown or crash in their cars, they perish in air disasters, they die on the battlefield, or fall victim to a suicide bomber at a checkpoint in the Middle East or Iraq, they are hacked to death with ice picks, slashed by knives, run through by swords or pierced by lances, they are gassed to death, they freeze to death and are incinerated in fires. They stumble and crack their heads open on the edges of bathtubs and doors, they fall on the steepest ski slopes and bleed to death when their arteries are severed, they die in childbirth, in their sickbeds, of cancer and plague, brain hemorrhages and heart attacks. They die on the cross, in the electric chair, on the gallows, and strapped to a table with poison injected into their blood. This death, which is visual and unattached in time or place, floating freely and weightlessly in our sky of images, is a surrogate, a substitute for real death, absorbing our fear and anxiety, while real death, the physical death of the body, the way it occurs in a certain place at a certain time, is hidden away as much as possible. And when it occurs, when we encounter it in the real world, the way it really is, when it descends from heaven to earth in all its chthonic longing, its lust for mull and humus, darkness and damp, and the corpse lies there in front of our eyes, stiff and dead, it is as if a veil is drawn aside, for we are not modern at all, we are old as the dolmens and barrows, kin to the grass and trees, the worms and snails that slither as best they can, one day simply to lie there, immovable beneath the sky, to disintegrate and be gone, a speck in all the world's jagged edges and swirling forms, made from dust, returned to dust, earthly in marrow and bone, hands and feet bound to the now that we today, despite all promises to the contrary, depart. But we cannot part from death, death will never betray us, death comes to us always, and with it life.

I saw a cruise ship thronged with people pass slowly through a sinking city, a loudspeaker voice blaring out, a glitter of flashing cameras, and was it death I saw?

Indeed, and it was sublime. The sublime is everything, though now, in our fracturing world, it has become almost extinct. We live under the hegemony of constituent parts, and death too is under its jurisdiction. It is the death of the individual that matters, we are snatched away one by one, hidden from each other's gaze, and only the specified death matters. Not Death, but the death of constricted arteries and overexerted hearts, the death of lungs eaten up by cancer. The same applies to beauty. The covers of chunky art books almost always show a small section of a painting, a hand, the gaze of an eye, a bird, a sky, a figure in the background, seldom the painting in its entirety. Inside their covers the painting appears together with various sections of it, often with an X-ray for good measure so we can study for ourselves the processes that went into making the finished painting. Aha, so he moved the hat? In the case of a famous painting, lesser-known paintings from the same period are shown alongside it, and in the accompanying essays the issues raised are most usually social in nature – the people in that Renaissance painting, what clothes are they wearing? What class do they belong to? What sort of economic system was the artist a part of? Where did they get their paints, did they leave any fingerprints anywhere? What currents made the perspective possible or necessary? Was the painter a homosexual, and in what ways does this show in what he chose to paint? Why were there so few women painters, and how has this affected the way we perceive quality? This atomization of everything, this is also a result of the primacy of the visual, since it is no longer the impression art or death or the divine awakens in us that applies, but what it looks like – in the case of the body, what kind of memories precede our expiry; in the case of art, not the impression itself, but the preconditions of that impression. This atomization, which Broch and many around him believed to represent a degeneration, but which of course may also be seen as an enormous revitalization of a slowly withering culture, something to which not least the paintings of the Baroque attest, the world there almost exploding in detail and the own beauty of our physical reality in everything from pheasant feathers to dead hares, apples, blunderbusses, skulls, and shells, was met by another, seemingly contrary tendency, a universal science, una scientia universalis to use the words of Francis Bacon, achieved through principles of observation, probability, and verification. It is impossible to think of a science that is local, that a phenomenon or object, for instance, should display properties that applied only in one place, only then. Seventeenth-century debate about the wonder or miracle, which until then had been fully believed in, the improbable event that occurred only once, in one place, never to be repeated, perhaps illustrates better than anything the new line that was drawn through the world, as well as its impact. In his Religio Medici from 1635, Thomas Browne writes:

> That Miracles are ceased, I can neither prove, nor absolutely deny, much lesse define the time and period of their cessation; that they survived Christ, is manifest upon record of Scripture; that they outlived the Apostles also, & were revived at the conversion of Nations, many yeares after, we cannot deny, if wee shall not question those Writers whose testimonies wee doe not controvert, in points that make for our own opinions; therefore that may have some truth in it that is reported by the Jesuites of their Miracles in the Indies; I could wish it were true, or had any other testimony than their owne Pennes.

On the one hand he argues in favor of the unchallenged authority of Scripture, doubting not for a moment the existence of miracles as a phenomenon, these being described in the Bible and therefore necessarily true; on the other hand he is troubled by doubt as to whether the miracle exists in his own time, Scripture in this instance falling short, requiring him to seek independent testimony. This new way of reasoning, based on observation, was gradually to displace faith and the idea of the holy, though the two viewpoints were nevertheless not dissimilar, since what characterizes the holy, its exclusion of all that is not holy, in like manner characterizes the rational, which excludes all that is not rational. This state of affairs still holds. Religion and art are no longer midpoints in our ways of perception, but exist at the periphery, without power or influence. While religion has become a personal matter – if a person is Christian, it is his own, private belief – art has turned to addressing issues that arise in the social domain in which our lives are played out, and on the odd occasion it chances to home in on that middle point of meaning where our world is defined, which is to say in the laboratory and the observatory, it invariably comes across as rather amateurish and undignified. At once ignorant and ingratiating, it talks big about string theory or quantum physics. A new path for the novel? For humankind? Party afterward? Anyone?

When I was a boy I wanted to be a surgeon. It was a wish that probably came from watching the medical programs shown on Norwegian TV in the seventies, long sequences of actual operations that had me completely captivated. The body was never shown in its entirety, only the parts of it that were cut into, the rest was covered up by material of the same kind and color as the aprons and masks worn by the surgeons and nurses. It was a smooth, pristine material without folds or stains, against which the white skin that lay like a crater in the middle with all its irregularities seemed almost obscene. When the scalpel was inserted and the section of skin cut open by the faceless surgeon under the light of a powerful lamp, it seemed as if a little ditch appeared. When held open by clamps it was seen to be full of fluids and pulsating organs impossible to distinguish from one another, much less identify, yet they gleamed like membranes in the light, and clearly some order did exist, for the rubber-clad fingers set to work swiftly and with obvious experience. And so it was I saw the heart, the blind beast that moves in the chest, and the blood in which it bathed. Many of my drawings from that time are of surgeons operating on patients, they were gory and full of blood, and my mother worried about me: perhaps there was something wrong? But surgery was part of a pattern; my other interests were diving and space exploration, all three areas having in common the fact that they served to open up the world, in the first instance the human body, in the second ocean life, in the third the vastness of the cosmos. I was fascinated by everything that was hidden to the human eye, longed to see into life's secret rooms, to be admitted into the unknown. Of those rooms, the human body was perhaps the most exciting in that the unknown was inside me and in everyone I saw, always there no matter which way I turned, and yet not, for the body's gurgling, blood-drenched inner realm remained out of reach, impossible to enter. Every summer we penetrated the surface of the sea and could glimpse the shimmering, darting life that existed there. The black universe of space revealed itself to us with twinkling stars on the clear nights of winter and autumn, when even planets might be visible too. Only the room of the body remained closed. The small gray sacks of the lungs; the spongy growth of the brain on its spinal-cord stalk; the tubes that transported the blood this way and that, through all the flesh and tissue of the body; these were things I had never seen. The closest I got were those images of operations on the TV screen. I have no idea how many such programs were broadcast, but presumably it was two or three series at most. Yet the impression they made remained, the fascination with the body's internal workings, the strangeness of that secret life never left me, though it became gradually more ambivalent, often merging with revulsion; the sight of the body's insides was at once revolting and alluring. As an adult I became absorbed by the exploration of the body that came with the Renaissance, when the physical human being was methodically mapped out for the first time, primarily by way of the dissection of fresh human corpses, often executed criminals, though sometimes bodies would be taken from churchyards, laid open behind closed doors or frequently in public in the context of anatomy lectures at the universities, in the so-called anatomical theaters. It was state-of-the-art science. Thomas Browne traveled from England to continental Europe at the beginning of the seventeenth century so as to study anatomy at Montpellier, surgery at Padua, and pharmacology at Leiden. But it was also a spectacle and a form of popular entertainment, the internal physical body was a sensation, a fairground of flesh and blood.

Four hundred years on, what seems strange is not the phenomenon itself, but that such fascination did not emerge earlier. What prevented the people of the Ancient World or the Medieval Age from exploring the inner body? The ancient Egyptians were familiar with it due to their culture of embalming, but they were never fascinated by the workings and interplay of the human organs, their practice being completely focused on death and respect for the deceased. The Greeks, who took the practice of medicine from sorcery to rational science, based their knowledge of the internal human body on what they could observe and understand from the insides of animals and, one might imagine, on what was revealed by accidents or war, when the body revealed itself in various ways: the brain inside a shattered skull, the colon spilling from a slashed belly, the jutting bone and ragged tendons and arteries of a severed foot or arm. The idea that they might dissect a corpse themselves and study it at their leisure did not occur to them. The thought must have been impossible, for their thirst for knowledge was in every other respect insatiable.

Why was that thought so impossible?

Perhaps they regarded the body and life as one, so that the notion of dissection made no sense to them; perhaps they did not understand that the life of one body could be prolonged by the knowledge gained from dissecting another; perhaps they saw no worth in prolonged life. Or perhaps they simply considered the inner body to be sacrosanct. Whatever the reason, they did not cut up the bodies of the dead and consequently knew little about the functions of the internal organs. Their writings on medicine and biology, full of approximations and guesswork yet nonetheless surprisingly reliable in view of the absence of empirical observation, were standard through the hundreds of years before the Renaissance, when they continued to carry such weight that both Dürer's and Leonardo's anatomical studies, made with human corpses in front of them, contain errors, details of medical literature rather than the medical body, indicating that what they knew occasionally overrode what they actually saw. The same was true of Charles Estienne's anatomical drawings from 1546, which include details of Galen's text that were in fact nonexistent. But the new paradigm quickly replaced the old, the best anatomical drawings of the seventeenth century are so exact as to still be useful for teaching purposes. Naturally, such a radical modification of our human knowledge did not occur without opposition. In the mid-sixteenth century Paracelsus for instance wrote as follows on the matter of dissection:

> It is in no way sufficient to view the human body, to dissect, then to view again, and finally to boil it and look at it once again. To view in this way is to be compared with the unlearned peasant reading psalms: he reads only the letters and there is nothing more to say about him.

Paracelsus's alternative was magic. Only in the relations between the heavenly and the earthly, the concealed and the unconcealed could the true nature of things be explained. His arguments proceeded from a medieval conception of reality, a world consisting of correspondences between what was visible and what was not, between the microcosmos of the human and the macrocosmos of the universe, a God's book whereby everything was a sign of something else and nothing existed simply on its own terms. To describe what was evident in the material world was meaningless until rendered otherwise by demonstrating or establishing its connection to the immaterial world. Paracelsus, with his to our mind chaotic hodgepodge of natural science, morals, magic, and metaphysics, in a world populated by spirits bound respectively to the elements of fire, earth, water, and air, connected with the human sphere in a near-infinite number of ways, was oblivious to the significance of anatomy to medical science, and from the perspective of his writings the practices of a figure such as Leonardo da Vinci, two generations older than Paracelsus, come across as empty exercises, whereas to Leonardo himself his work must have felt like an adventure, a second Creation no less.

In his notebooks Leonardo seems almost obsessive in his urge to delve into our physical reality, and he makes no distinction between the human and the material, the living and the dead, he wants to describe and capture it all, to understand. How come the fossils of mussels and sea creatures can be discovered at the top of a mountain? How come older people see things better from a distance? How come the sky is blue? What is heat? He attempts to describe the causes of laughter and crying, the nature of a sneeze, a yawn. He wants to know all about the falling sickness, spasms, paralysis. Why do we shiver when we are cold, and why do we sweat? What are fatigue, hunger, thirst, lust? He wants to explore our beginnings in the womb and to discover why an eight-month-old fetus dies. He wants to detail which muscles decay when we grow fat, and which become pronounced when we are thin. He wonders why the spots on the moon change when observed over time, and explains them as being caused by clouds rising from its waters, coming between the sun and those waters, by their shadow depriving them of the sun's rays, the waters thereby remaining dark and unable to reflect the solar body. In all his observations and speculations he proceeds from what he sees with his own eye, and only that. Leonardo describes a world without transcendence, and yet it does not in any way appear closed, on the contrary, for not only is the richness of what his eye is drawn toward overwhelming, his very gaze is moreover so fresh that everything he sees, even the sun and the moon, the rivers and the floodplains, seems almost to engage and take part in the vigor and clarity of the new. The old world with its dizzying transcendence is quite absent, albeit still perceptible, in the will of the new. Little or nothing of that from which the need wrenches away is expressed, but it is found in the very sensation of that detachment, which is the sensation of freedom.

Oddly, Leonardo's paintings seem quite apart from that sensation. They are masterworks of course, but at the same time too saturated in a way; their vital sense is that of harmony and clarity, his technique of rounding shapes, allowing them to glide off into their surroundings without losing substance and solidity in the process, may have something to do with it, but also the regularity of his compositions, so perfect as to lose all tension and become . . . well, rather lazy. Leonardo's paintings are never arresting to me in the way his notebooks are arresting. I suppose it has to do with the simple fact that as a painter he belonged to a tradition and saw things with the eyes of that tradition, painted with its techniques, whereas as an anatomist, biologist, physicist, geologist, geographer, astronomer, and inventor he was forging his own path. "The tears come from the heart and not from the brain," he suddenly writes. Or, in one of his many strange prophecies, "Men will come out of their graves turned into flying creatures; and they will attack other men, taking their food from their very hand or table. (As flies.)" That tone, that temperament, which is not without wildness and which is quite as unpredictable as it is exact, is wholly absent from his paintings, with one remarkable exception: Lady with an Ermine. I bought a poster of it on a trip to Italy with Espen more than ten years ago, it's on the wall in my living room now and I still haven't tired of looking at it. The motif is simple, a young woman holding a white-coated stoat, an ermine, to her chest; the animal is looking the same way as she, right of picture, and her right hand rests against its back. It's a disturbing picture. Why, I don't know, but the background is completely black, there is nothing else but this woman and this animal, and perhaps what is disturbing about it lies in this very juxtaposition. The woman's face is sharper than any other of Leonardo's female faces, and the hand that rests on the animal's spine is thin and bony, slightly out of proportion to what we can see of the rest of her body, slightly too big, and while the model he hired may actually have had big hands, our gaze is nevertheless drawn toward it in such a way that along with the head of the animal it forms the focal point of the picture. The hand, placed there to soothe and comfort, makes plain to us the animal's unease. Its rather bony appearance emphasizes its physiological aspect, a rare occurrence in Leonardo's paintings, which are nearly always more immersed in their colors and forms, their saturatedness, and together with the animal's intensely nonhuman presence, seemingly outside the sphere of the woman's attention, it appears almost as if her body splits in two before our eyes, one part belonging to the physiological, biological, bestial, the fingernails on her hand, for instance, corresponding with the claws of the animal's foot, the animal's eye the same color as the woman's eye, the other part belonging to the human, that which has to do with her serenity, the fact of the animal being outside her consciousness, her mind concerned with something else, perhaps with what she is looking at, perhaps with something within herself, but whatever it is, she is serene. Her dress, the pearls around her neck, her hair band, these things belong to that sphere, outside of which is the animal. Part of what is disturbing about the painting lies in the exactness with which the animal is depicted, quite unlike other animals in Leonardo's paintings, his lions, for instance, his horses and lambs. The ermine is neither biblical nor mythological, it doesn't belong to the battle or to any idyll but is there in its own right, as this one, particular animal. One might imagine this to be themed in the shape of fauns, half human, half animal, or a Pan figure, or perhaps centaurs, mythology is full of all sorts of creatures existing in the space between human and animal, but that would have made the picture an illustration, and this is precisely what Leonardo shuns here, the illustration of a thought or notion: the picture is the thought.

His anatomical sketches exhibit nothing of this, although the encounter they represent, of art and the body, is the same as in Lady with an Ermine. Perhaps this is because in the sketches the two aspects are compounded, the sketches representing the body in themselves, whereas the painting exists in the space in between. Of course, the difference between the drawing and the drawn is quite as big in both cases, but when it comes to sketches of the human body, an enormous number have been produced since Leonardo's time, and what was then a new phenomenon is now so common we no longer see it as a phenomenon at all, or even as drawings done by a certain artist, they are merely a part of the anonymous flood of textbook illustrations and instructions in which we paddle for the first time in childhood and never really step out of again, where everything that exists and occurs is conveyed by diagrams, like the elements of the molecule, the chlorophyll production of trees, the orbit of the planets around the sun, or the components of the inner ear. It was most certainly different for Leonardo, he draws everything like it was for the first time, and so new and controversial is the practice of drawing the inner human body from the study of corpses that he feels the need to defend himself in the introduction to his anatomy notes, swiping at a fictitious you who claims there is more to be had out of watching the dissection itself than studying one of the drawings:

> And you, who say it would be better to watch the anatomist at work than to see these drawings, you would be right, if it were possible to observe all the things that are demonstrated in such drawings in a single figure, in which you, with all your cleverness, will not see nor obtain knowledge of more than some few veins, to obtain a true and perfect knowledge of which I have dissected more than ten human bodies, destroying all the other members, and removing the very minutest particles of the flesh by which these veins are surrounded, without causing them to bleed, excepting the insensible bleeding of the capillary veins; and as one single body would not last so long, since it was necessary to proceed with several > bodies by degrees, until I came to an end and had a complete knowledge; this I repeated twice, to learn the differences.

> And if you should have a love for such things you might be prevented by loathing, and if that did not prevent you, you might be deterred by the fear of living in the night hours in the company of those corpses, quartered and flayed and horrible to see.

What Leonardo is pleading here is the utility value of simplification in a world unfamiliar with the diagram. His fictional opponent believes it better to watch the dissection as it takes place, since the dissection itself is closer to reality, whereas Leonardo holds that reality, in this case the body, is too complicated and is best understood when conveyed by means of a drawing, which brings out its essence; ten corpses were required before he knew enough about the blood vessels to be able to draw them. The line of progression is from the chaos and confusion of reality to the order and functionality of the diagram, but also from the truth of the particular instance, local and tangible, this particular body, to the truth of all instances, the universal and general, all bodies. Leonardo's drawings are not diagrams, he does not simplify what he sees, but rather endeavors to depict what he sees as accurately as possible, but in order to do so he must isolate the individual parts so that they may be presented more clearly, and as such he both removes himself from and steps closer to the reality he depicts, a progression that resembles a law: the closer you get to a true picture of the physical world, the more remote it becomes.

What makes Leonardo's anatomical drawings so interesting is that they are there at the very outset of that progression, or are perhaps even its instigation, at the same time as they are there too at another point of intersection, that between art and science.

What exactly is going on when a painting such as Lady with an Ermine generates all manner of emotions and moods, opening itself to the beholder, who more than six hundred years on cannot help but find it dense with meaning, while a picture of the inner body drawn by the same artist at much the same time is experienced as something neutral, a fact closed upon itself, apart from the vague impression it gives of the age in which it was produced, over which the artist has absolutely no control?

Art is what the institution deems to be art, that is a tenet of modernism, but such a distinction is of no use here, because although we might consider the anatomical drawings to be art, this says nothing of their radical distinctness vis-à-vis Lady with an Ermine, which so plainly is something else entirely. Nor is it helpful to suggest that one has more quality than the other, or that one is reductive, the other not, because such reduction is conspicuous too in Lady with an Ermine, the pure black of the background removing the motif from its context, and only its core elements, the female subject's upper body and the wriggling animal, being depicted. Yet one can stare and continue to stare at such a painting, which comes alive in the beholder's gaze and seems inexhaustible, whereas the drawings of the inner body saturate the senses in a different way entirely, constraining our gaze and the emotions that follow on: what we see is what there is. In other words, the painting contains more. But what is this "more"? What does the painting have that the drawings don't?

In Jorge Luis Borges's renowned first collection of stories and essays, Labyrinths, there is a short story called "Pierre Menard, Author of the Quixote." According to its narrator, Pierre Menard was a recently deceased, lesser-known French author, a symbolist and friend of Paul Valéry. The narrator wishes to honor his memory, which is already receding, and lists his few works, among them a number of sonnets and monographs, one of the latter concerning Leibniz's Characteristica Universalis, another on the subject of Ramon Llull's Ars Magna Generalis, which gives us an indication of where Borges is heading, before concentrating on Menard's most important work, described as perhaps the most significant of our time, comprising the ninth and thirty-eighth chapters of the first part of Don Quixote, as well as a fragment of the twenty-second chapter. Menard did not merely copy these chapters, as anyone could have, instead he created them anew, an achievement characterized by the narrator as heroic, indisputably greater than Cervantes's own in writing the novel in the first place. It is one thing to pen a chivalric satire and have a decrepit nobleman ride off into the villages of seventeenth-century Spain, easy enough as a Spaniard living in the seventeenth century, but quite another to do so as a Frenchman at the beginning of the twentieth century. The very premise is an improvement, the narrator opines, comparing two brief passages from the two works.

> It is a revelation to compare Menard's Don Quixote with Cervantes's. The latter, for example, wrote (part one, chapter nine):
> . . . truth, whose mother is history, rival of time, depository of deeds, witness of the past,
> exemplar and adviser to the present, and the future's counselor.
> Written in the seventeenth century, written by the "lay genius" Cervantes, this enumeration is a mere rhetorical praise of history. Menard, on the other hand, writes:
> exemplar and adviser to the present, and the future's counselor.
> History, the mother of truth: the idea is astounding. Menard, a contemporary of William James, does not define history as an inquiry into reality, but as its origin. Historical truth, for him, is not what has happened; it is what we judge to have happened.

By juxtaposing the idea of originality with that of its repetition, which is impossible and therefore naturally ranks higher than any renewal, Borges rearranges the hierarchy between new and the same, bringing the two concepts into the light. The idea that Don Quixote cannot be written again is so obvious it probably never occurred to anyone before Borges wrote his story about Menard's fabulous achievement, and for that very reason it is significant: what we see but are not consciously aware of seeing, the invisible world of laws and rules in which we move about and by which we are governed, the time and space of the given, is our cage as well as our home. Art is what cannot be done again, Borges reminds us, and is as such akin to the miracle. That someone else by coincidence should happen to paint Lady with an Ermine exactly as Leonardo did is an impossible thought, whereas that of someone drawing the same picture of the heart or the chest or the arm with its exposed tendons and blood vessels is not. The painting has a time and a place, it is a situation encapsulated, with all its properties and details, whereas the drawings of the body are timeless and placeless. What matters in the painting is the particular woman, the particular animal, the unique and local, whereas in the drawings it is all bodies, the general and universal.

Art is unique and local, striving always toward the unique and local, resisting everything that seeks to pull it from that trajectory. Its entire value resides in this. Even a painting by someone like Malevich, whose simple geometric figures or wholly monochrome surfaces seemingly aim toward total generality, is unique and local, for rather than being the expression of those figures in themselves, the painting is Malevich's depiction of them, and this presence of another human being fixes the painting in time: it could not have been painted by anyone else. When this is copied, and inevitably any bold style will be absorbed by others, the art is no longer unique, it becomes less local, and anemic. Without exception the paintings of the Norwegian and Swedish Cubists pale beside those of Picasso and Léger. It is this notion of the unique that "Pierre Menard, Author of the Quixote" is about. Art is what cannot be done again, but unlike the miracle, art extends in time and spans the generations, and it is into that temporal space Borges directs Menard when ingeniously he finds a way out of his own age and into the past without losing sight of either, enabling himself to perform the feat of making the copy original without alteration, the twentieth century's entire mind-set going back with him and exerting its own pressure on the sentences Cervantes once constructed, altering them as if from within, because what we know always shapes what we see. So enthusiastic is Borges's narrator about this new literary invention that he suggests the method be applied to other works, concluding with the question: "To attribute the Imitatio Christi to Louis Ferdinand Céline or to James Joyce, is this not a sufficient renovation of its tenuous spiritual indications?"

Nothing is coincidental in Borges's work, not even the choice of reference. The Imitatio Christi, or Imitation of Christ, is a collection of fifteenth-century texts attributed to the monk Thomas à Kempis, one of Christianity's most widely read books, renunciant of worldly life in its standpoint and holding up the life of Christ on earth as its ideal, hence the title, primarily motivated by a quote from Matthew:

> Then Jesus said unto his disciples, If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me. For whosoever will save his life shall lose it: and whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall find it. For what is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? Or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul? For the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father with his angels; and then he shall reward every man according to his works.

The idea of denying oneself and living a life in imitation of another is even more radical and impossible than Menard's, and yet this was a genuine endeavor, not in detail, obviously, though the occasional wound may well have opened miraculously in someone's hand or side at various intervals throughout the Middle Ages, but in spirit, and this, the devotion of one's life to another, is the greatest sacrifice a human can make. The thought of Céline or Joyce, the two great idiosyncracies of twentieth-century literature, having written such a work is of course a joke, for if anyone ever invested themselves in their writing, and if anyone were ever as oblivious to the idea of humility, it was they. Their souls would have been damaged by it.

For us, the one true life is our own singular life, unexampled and individual, while imitation is false and submissive. In the Imitatio Christi imitation is the ideal, the possibility of withdrawing from life and devoting oneself fully to Christ being ever present, always hallowed, never anemic or strange. And while Scripture was paramount, governing people's understanding of everything, the material as well as the immaterial, while it was the form into which everything had to fit, a dizzying system of correspondences and connections devised in its name, an unparalleled instance of universalism, the body was always there, at the center of it all, the body of Christ, the flesh and blood of the Son of Man, which although dissolved in the text and in the language, was the point from which all theological abstractions radiated. This was evident not least in the relics that filled medieval churches, monasteries, and cathedrals. These were ranked according to a system based on physical proximity: first-order relics were everything that derived from the bodies of the saints or disciples – hair, nails, fragments of bone, even whole skeletons; to the second order belonged objects they had used or carried about their persons; the third order comprised things that had come into contact with them in some other way or had been stored in proximity to first-order relics. The most precious were those associated with the body of Christ and his life on earth, the holiest of all being those connected with the crucifixion: splinters of the cross, thorns of the crown, the head of the lance with which he was prodded, cloth from the garments of people who had been present, and, of course, the shroud itself. The adoration of all these objects, which could take on hysterical forms, many of them associated with miracles and healing, comprises the very core of Christianity, expressing its innermost truth and authentic nature: that God in Christ became man, was born into the human world, a living body, a person who for some thirty years lived here among us, in our world. The idea is so radical as to be impossible to take in, much less understand, other than in fleeting, emotional moments of insight. The relics opened that insight, the divine was local, could be associated with places to which one could travel and see with one's own eyes, and with identifiable people who once, not that many generations before, actually existed. The Old Testament was local too, almost all the places mentioned in it were still in existence, and if one cared to investigate one would find that all were close to each other. The River Jordan, the Sinai Desert, the Dead Sea, Mount Gilboa, the brook of Zered, the plains of Moab. Jerusalem, Bethlehem, Hebron, Gaza, Beersheba, Ezion-Geber, all inside an area no bigger than a Norwegian fylke. For us this sense of the local trails off into the exotic and remote, everything in the Bible takes place far away, the narrative is all about others and their country. But what if it had been about us and our country? The local aspect would then have been plain to us. Moses and the children of Israel might have come into the Setesdal, having wandered about the Hardangervidda for forty years. Moses could have received the Tablets of the Law, inscribed with the Ten Commandments, on the Gaustatoppen, and the Promised Land he was allowed to see but not to enter might have been Aust-Agder. The Lord's speech to him about the Promised Land, following the Golden Calf incident, might have gone like this: "I will send an angel before you and drive out the Setesdalers, the Arendalites and the Frolanders, the Hisøyites and the Tromøyites. Go down to the land flowing with milk and honey. But I will not go with you, because you are a stiff-necked people." And Deuteronomy's magnificent finale might have been as follows:

> And Moses descended from the plains of the Hardangervidda into the Setesdal and went up into the hills there, over against Valle. And the Lord shewed him all the land: from Byggland unto Evje and Åmli, from Birkenes unto Hægebostad, and all of Agder unto Arendal and the utmost sea to the south, and Grimstad and Lillesand, all the land of the south unto Kristiansand. And the Lord said unto him. This is the land which I sware unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, saying, I will give it unto thy seed: I have caused thee to see it with thine eyes, but thou shalt not go over thither. So Moses the servant of the Lord died there in the Setesdal, according to the word of the Lord. And he buried him in the Setesdal, over against Bykle: but no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day.

But it is not just the geography that draws the texts of the Old Testament toward the sphere of the local, the people in them do too. Those who had in common the fact that God had appeared before them are named, they possess their own, clear character traits and personalities, from the fearful Lot to the cunning Isaac, and if nothing remains to testify to their existence outside these texts, it is not necessarily because they were figures of mythology created in the depths of popular imagination, but because the age in which they lived is so very remote. The way in which their stories are told reinforces the local aspect and anchors them in time, for there are no abstractions or systems, practically no mythological or fairy-tale-type constructions, everything conveyed is conveyed through descriptions of concrete events in the concrete world. Soil, sand, roads, houses, blood. Journeys, births, battles, flight.

Explanation is anathema in these texts, all meaning must be extracted from the events portrayed, which are not relative, only unfathomable. Why are they unfathomable? Events are not a language, though they may be conveyed by one. When we understand an event, we do so by virtue of the culture in which the event takes place. If that culture no longer exists, our understanding fails and the events are left behind, as mysterious to us as the statues on Easter Island. The stories of the Bible are ancient, and in them are traces of stories even more ancient.

When I started school at Sandnes primary in 1975, Christian studies was still one of the most important subjects, together with Norwegian, math, and the combined studies of science, history, geography, and social studies, and for the most part it consisted of our teacher, Helga Torgersen, telling us stories from the Bible, and our drawing or talking about them afterwards. It was a pastoral world we entered, dramatic and full of light. Being Christian was about being good and kind. All of us wanted that, but gradually, one by one, we fell by the wayside as we approached puberty. I held out for a long time, to me mopeds were bad, one-armed bandits were bad, even cola and peanuts were tinged with badness. To this day I remain wary of such deviations; driving above the speed limit fills me with guilt for days; killing a fly or watching a plant in the apartment die because I've forgotten to water it pains me unspeakably, for the desire to be good and decent has kept itself alive in me through all these years. What I know now, which I did not know then, is that there are forces inside us oblivious to good and bad, and emotions that can be so powerful as to override everything without our even knowing that we are in their grip, for the ego, the I, that thin sliver of light at the edge of our consciousness, contains our whole identity, colors our understanding of all the other forces, desires, and emotions that exist within us, much as the age in which we live colors our perception of the past, for there is no natural outside, neither in the body nor in society, and to arrive at such a place, from where we can see ourselves or the age in which we live, requires an effort, and that effort is huge, for the forces that pull on our self-awareness and on the contemporary age, drawing everything into their domain, are not gravitational, but centripetal. The Bible, however, is one such outside, particularly the texts of the Old Testament, simultaneously remote and proximate, familiar and strange. They are ancient and we are separated from the lives they portray by a chasm of thousands of years. At the same time they belong to our culture, our grandparents, great-grandparents, great-great-grandparents, and the generations before them, all the way back to the first millenium, read the same texts, which shaped them and their culture, in which we continue to live to this day, albeit its form has since become somewhat modified. A story such as that of Cain and Abel carries with it not only our prehistory but also the fifth century of Augustine of Hippo, the thirteenth century of Thomas Aquinas and Dante, the seventeenth century of Shakespeare and Bacon, as well as our own childhood and contemporary age. In translating that story into modern language, much of its strangeness disappears, whereas sticking closely to the Hebrew original makes it incomprehensible. A compromise might look like this:

> And the man came to Eve, his wife, and she conceived and bore Cain, and said, The Lord has given me a man. And she bore his brother, Abel, and he was a shepherd, and Cain a tiller of the earth. One day, when his work was done, Cain brought grain from his field in offering to the Lord, while Abel brought the fattest cuts of the first lamb of his flock. And the Lord regarded Abel and respected his offering, yet ignored Cain and his. Cain was enraged and his face fell, and the Lord said to him, Why are you angry? Why has your face fallen? Lift it up and you will be accepted; if not, sin will gather at your door and you shall be its desire and rule over it. And Cain talked with his brother Abel; they were in the field, and Cain rose up against his brother and killed him. And the Lord said to Cain, Where is Abel, your brother? And Cain replied, Am I my brother's keeper? And the Lord said, What have you done? The voice of your brother's blood cries to me from the ground. And now you shall be banished from the good earth that has opened her mouth to receive your brother's blood from your hand. Tilling the land will no more yield its grain to you, henceforth you shall be a fugitive and a vagabond on earth. And Cain said to the Lord, My punishment > is greater than I can bear. Behold, you have driven me out this day from the face of the earth, and from your face I shall be hidden; and I shall be a fugitive and a vagabond, and anyone who finds me may kill me. And the Lord said to him, Therefore, whoever slays Cain, vengeance shall be taken on him sevenfold. And the Lord set a mark upon Cain, lest anyone finding him should try to kill him. And Cain went from the presence of the Lord and settled in the land of Nod, east of Eden.

It is a simple story, yet strange. A man kills his brother and God sends him away, at the same time placing a mark on him to prevent anyone from killing him. What does it mean? Oh, the blood and the earth are everything here. The Lord respects the lamb, the blood sacrifice, but not the grain. Cain kills Abel, blood is shed, the Lord curses Cain but does not kill him, and wishes him not to be killed by any other, for Abel is dead, and it is Cain who lives and may pass on the blood. And the blood is bound up with the earth, firstly through their father, who bears its name, adama in the Hebrew, which is to say through a creature of God, then by way of the blood that is shed, death, and the blood's return to the earth. The voice of the blood cries from the ground, the mouth of the earth opens to receive it. But neither the blood nor the earth are driving forces in the narrative, merely stations between which the story passes. What drives the narrative is the face and the gaze. The Lord regards Abel. Cain's face falls. The Lord admonishes him, he must lift his face, otherwise sin will gather at his door. He disobeys, kills his brother, and from then on he will be hidden from the face of the Lord. And since surface and face are the same word in Hebrew, his banishment from the face of the earth may be taken literally, the face, or gaze, of the earth.

Cain was enraged and his face fell.

Cain is ignored, the Lord does not regard him, this is the story's starting point. Ignored and unregarded, he is no one, and if he is no one he is dead, and if he is dead he has nothing to lose. What might he have lost? Might he have lost face? But his face was already lost. The crux lies in the void between Cain's face not being regarded and his lowering his face so that it can no longer be seen. The fallen face is directly associated with evil, for God says, "Lift it up and you will be accepted." See and be seen. If not, "sin will gather at your door and you shall be its desire and rule over it." To turn away, which is not merely not to see, but also not to be seen, is perilous, for there, in that gap, that uncorrected reservoir of space, sin gathers.

And his face fell.

Lift it up.

The face is the other, and in its light we become. Without that face we are no one, and if we are no one we are dead, and if we are dead we can do as we please. With that face, which sees us and is seen by us, we cannot do as we please. The face puts us under an obligation. This is why God says lift it up. Take that obligation upon yourself. But Cain does not lift his face, he does not take that obligation upon himself, he oversteps the bounds of the social and kills his brother. The transgression affects them deeply, since the person he kills is his brother, which in this archaic world is to say his own blood. And such violence against the self is the most dangerous of all, since it is almost impossible to guard against; it comes from the we, not from the alien without, not from any them, but from the you of the fallen face.

Fratricide is still going on around us, brother killing brother someplace in Africa, in Asia, in Europe; yesterday, today, tomorrow; it occurs, and then the occurrence is gone. Nothing of being human has changed since biblical times: we are born, we love and hate, we die. But our archaic aspect and the things we do are sucked up by our quotidian lives in the contemporary age we have created and which we comprise, where reality is above all horizontal and the vertical only seldom glimpsed and acknowledged. Yet all we have to do is to look up to grasp it, for above us is the sun, blazing, the same sun that blazed for Cain and Abel, Odysseus and Aeneas. The fells before our eyes are of similar dizzying age. That we are but the latest in a line of ancestry reaching back thousands of generations into the past, emotionally the same as them, for the heart that beat in them beats also in us, is a perspective we are unable and unwilling to take upon ourselves, for in it our uniqueness is erased and we become merely a locus of feelings and actions, much as water is the locus of waves, or the sky of clouds. We know each cloud to be unique, each wave to be unique, yet we see only clouds, only waves. Mythology points directly into that space, since each myth is about the one, yet what it expresses applies to us all. Cain is enraged, his face falls. Cain is assailed by hatred and is made blind, he assails his own brother and kills him. The myth is about forces in the human that cannot be subsumed into the individual's identity or the sphere of the social, instead breaking loose and running riot. It is about something out of control in the human itself, which we fear and tremble before, not unlike the way we react when confronted by the sublime in nature. This is the sublime in human nature, the wild and uncontrolled, the destructive aspect of our makeup that can be bridled neither by the individual nor by the structures of our social world, arising in one human being, who is all of us. The sublime in the one. But the sublime is also in the all, when we are one together, congregated in teeming numbers. The roar of a football crowd, the flow of mass protesters in the streets. Common to these two instances of the sublime in human nature is that both edge toward the place where what is individual and peculiar to the one ceases to exist. The place where our humanity dissolves into other forces of nature and loses itself. This is the boundary of the I, and it is the boundary of our culture, and as such it is justifiably feared. When the archaic is sucked into the quotidian and the sun that blazes in the sky is our sun, we live within culture, which relentlessly toils to confirm that idea, relentlessly drawing everything in toward the already known, whereas art quite differently is adjusted to what is beyond the boundary of the I and culture, the unfamiliar, and what used to be called the divine. Death is the gateway to the land from which we come and to which sooner or later we must return. It lies beyond language, beyond thought, beyond culture, and cannot be grasped but merely glimpsed, for example by our turning toward the mute and blind in ourselves. It is there always, even when we are having breakfast on a normal Tuesday morning and the coffee is a bit too strong, the rain is running down the windowpanes, the radio is sending out the seven o'clock news, and the living-room floor inside is littered with toys, even then the heart beats, the very muscle of the archaic, pumping its blood around the body. Culture is created to avoid that perspective, so that we might look away from the precipice at whose edge we exist, but contemporary culture, whose perspective belongs only to a couple of generations and which relates only to the most proximate history, what used to be called living memory, has never been absolute, for another age has always existed within it, the age in which nothing changes, where everything stays the same, the age of myths and rituals. That this aspect of our understanding of reality is gone does not mean that it is gone from reality. What did Hitler do when he withdrew into himself as a young man? He saw no one, and no one saw him. Not even as an adult did he attach himself to any you; when he was seen, he was seen only by a crowd, by the mass of an all, and the same was true when he wrote: Mein Kampf contains an I, contains a we, contains a they, but does not contain a you.

And his face fell.

The story of Cain and Abel is about the elimination of the you as the source of violence, and the reader may stop there or continue, for it does not simply concern one brother killing another, but relates also to sacrifice: Cain slays Abel after God accepts Abel's offering, an animal sacrifice, while ignoring Cain's offering of grain. The French anthropologist René Girard reads the story as expressing the function of the sacrifice in respect to the act of violence. Sacrifice brings violence into relief and steps into its place as a way of controlling its otherwise unbound forces within society; Cain does not have the violence-outlet of animal sacrifice at his disposal, and kills his brother. The surrogate function of sacrifice is made plain in the narrative of Abraham offering his son Isaac in sacrifice to God, when God yields and asks him to sacrifice a ram instead. This ram, Girard writes, is in Muslim tradition the same ram as once offered by Abel. The sacrifice is a ritual, it is collective, and it construes violence as collective.

The concept of sacrifice is mythic, central to primitive cultures, abandoned in those more developed, such as our own, where violence is understood to be something individual, arising in a particular situation, among particular people, and dealt with by a judicial system that punishes the guilty individual. The most important aim of the process of socialization in any society is for the individual to control his impulses, emotions, and actions, to avoid what destroys and corrodes all structures and communities, violence among like kind, and if the individual is unable to do this, and kills one or more of his own kind, he will be punished by the community through the apparatus of law. The forbiddance of violence among like kind occurs in all societies, indeed one cannot imagine a society without it. In primitive societies the distinction between the I and the we is less clear, discriminating and legislative institutions do not exist, and the insight of violence among like kind, the peril of internal disturbance, is therefore greater perhaps, the community being that much more vulnerable to its consequences. Girard believes that the wish to deal with violence among like kind lies behind all notions of taboo, which is a means of avoiding anything that might bring it about. If this is so, rituals stand for the very opposite, being a means of venturing to the point where forces are controlled, the repetitions of the ritual nullifying the arbitrary and constraining emotion.

But repetition is also tabooed, the emulative and the echoic, imitation, mimesis being likewise associated with peril, and according to Girard this is quite fundamental. In some primitive cultures twins are killed at birth. Mirrors too are often associated with danger; some cultures forbid the imitation of others, whether by gesture or the repetition of utterances; the doppelgänger has always put fear into people; many religions prohibit the depiction of their deity.

One might imagine that the fear of duplication, facsimile, imitation has to do with the notion of identity, the individual becoming lost in its image in the event that identity is unstable, open to the world, and susceptible to impregnation, but Girard believes the opposite to hold, that likeness represents a threat to the collective in that the act of violence cannot then be construed individually, related back to its perpetrator nor even associated with its results, being viewed not as a completed event, but instead, and to a much greater extent than in our own culture, in terms of process, seeing in it symmetry and likeness: two rivals facing off, between them an object, the bone of contention, and on either side of it they are alike. If not stopped, this likeness will be reproduced serially, in retaliations, representatives of the first taking vengeance on representatives of the second, and such violence, the violence of the blood feud, can go on through generations, the original conflict long since forgotten, consumed into the seriality.

In any small community such escalation is catastrophic, and it is its fundamental pattern, one against the other, that gives rise to duplication taboos, the manifest and mysterious fear of symmetry. Violence is imitative and repetitive. If taboos are an avoidance measure in this respect, sacrifice confronts it, not only by being its imitation and by recreating it serially in ritual, but also structurally, the sacrifice on the one side, the members of the community on the other, though not divided, the surrogate victim as scapegoat bearing the division, but collectively: the all against the one, which is then duly killed. And when it is done, only the all remains, a single, stable whole.

On the other hand, imitation may also be a desirable phenomenon in a culture, nearly all learning and development occurring by way of repetition and duplication, directly too in the imitation of role models, though never without some degree of ambivalence, since imitation of the one by the other is down to the one wanting what the other one has, and this, in Girard's terminology mimetic desire, is no stable concept. When the final commandment of the Old Testament decrees that you shall not covet your neighbor's wife, his ox, or anything else that belongs to him, the reason is of course that doing so would be a source of conflict, two facing off over an object desired by both; where two individuals confront each other in a state of mimetic desire, the object becomes the one subject by virtue of the imitation or duplication, which brings about an imbalance in the relation, whether it be the depiction eclipsing the depicted, or vice versa. The association of imitation with power, or lack of power, and in essence with violence, is according to Girard the reason for Plato's loathing of mimesis, the concept being unresolved in his writings; and he interprets the crisis of the we's collapse into the I as seen in schizophrenia as the expression of a lack of ability to imitate the other, something society is rooted in, and this is what manifests itself in the occasionally grotesque, parodic exaggerations often displayed by schizophrenics.

Girard's thinking concerning sacrifice and imitation is nonpsychological, seeking explanation not in the particular I, but in the collective, and construing violence as a structural entity. This aspect of violence has all but disappeared in our time, insofar as its containment has consisted of relating the act of violence itself, as well the emotions that give rise to it, to the individual in a system whereby the community steps in as soon as the trangressional act takes place, thereby regulating it and preventing its escalation, a fact that has led us to consider it in terms of the individual and accordingly made us blind to its collective aspect. But when any group emerges in society, placing value outside the individual and declining to identify with the authority of the state or with areas in which that power is weak, symmetrical, serial violence occurs once again; the Sicilian Mafia or the inner cities of the northeast of the United States are examples of environments in which the blood feud has recently been pivotal, and the gangs that populate the run-down areas of American cities gun each other down according to the same principle of retaliation. They destroy one another utterly, but the power of destruction lies not in their hands, it spirals out of control, and this was what primitive cultures sought to manage by their taboos and rituals, which nearly always ended in sacrifice. Their myths, and gradually their religions, were the expression of the collective, treating and concerning the whole, and as those cultures evolved, doing so in increasingly sophisticated ways. The Pentateuch, the Five Books of Moses, is the narrative of that evolution, from the emergence of man, the separation of culture from nature, to the establishment of a homogenous and civilized societal unit with laws, rules, forms of governance, and religion. What the sacrifice does is to establish differences in culture. Between life and death, animal and human, human and divine, but also differences within the human sphere, where the destructive power of likeness is separated out and dealt with by its transformation into unlikeness. The sacrificial offering is a language without words in which the unspoken is made manifest, not so much in order to be perceived as to be controlled, by being brought into existence. The sacrifice is a means of naming the unnameable, of giving form to the formless. The formless is likeness, there lies the point of departure of all creation narratives, including those of science. The first chapter of the Book of Genesis says, "And the earth was without form and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep. And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters." The void is nothing, emptiness is nothing, darkness is likeness, the deep is the boundless, the Spirit of God is the universe, the waters the undifferentiated. Then, by its very predication, land is separated from sea, night from day, sun from moon. God said let there be light, and there was light. When everything in the material world was separated, the animals that swim in the sea, creep on the land, and fly through the sky were created.

What is the nature of this first picture of life?

"Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life," it says. "And God created great whales, and every living creature that moveth, which the waters brought forth abundantly, after their kind, and every winged fowl."

The emphasis here is on quantity and movement: "abundantly," "moveth," "living creature," the "moving creature." Against this blind abundance of life stands the categorization of "after their kind," but so unspecifically is life described, primarily in terms of its living abundance only, that its categorization becomes secondary, much like the rattling pots that enclose the living, crawling lobsters as they are lifted into a boat.

Then comes evening, and after it the morning of the sixth day, and God creates the animals of the land, and creates man, the male and the female. And to them he says, "Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it: and have the dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth."

While the message in his commandment is that man is superior to all other living creatures, and thereby separated from them, distinct and on his own, the parallels in the choice of words pull the human irresistibly toward that abundance of life: "Be fruitful," it says, "and multiply, and replenish the earth," in other words man is considered as a mass, surrounded by the other masses of life, characterized by their movements, life that moveth, teeming, creeping, crawling.

And God says:

> Behold, I have given you every herb bearing seed, which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree, in which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed; to you it shall be for meat. And to every beast of the earth, and to every fowl of the air, and to every thing that creepeth upon the earth, wherein there is life, I have given every green herb for meat: and it was so. And God saw every thing that he had made, and, behold, it was very good.

The weight given to expansion is huge in this first chapter of the Old Testament, the idea of life extending out being presented as its fundamental condition. In this lies the notion of repetition, for what spreads is the same, life in its various forms, and it does so singly, the leaves of the deciduous tree that unfold every spring being the same leaf over and over again, as it does so together, the deciduous trees growing up in community, great forests extending ever deeper. Humanity is a part of this expansion, bound too by the imperative of multiplying and replenishing the earth, this being the very urge of life, to increase, and man is in this sense construed as life on the same level as all other living things.

But then something happens. In the second chapter of the Book of Genesis the narrative shifts from the remote to the near, and is no longer about the abstract universe, about the earth viewed generally, the sky viewed generally, life viewed generally, but about the particular place, this earth, this sky, the creation of these two particular people. Adam, whose name is associated with earth, and Eve, whose name is associated with life. Having breathed the breath of life into their nostrils, God places them in a garden, to the east, in Eden. And from the garden ran four named rivers: Pison, Gihon, Hiddekel, and Euphrates. After what happens there, when they eat the fruit of the Tree of Knowledge and are banished, several names appear. Adam and Eve's son Abel, who dies, and all the descendants of their son Cain: Enoch, Irad, Mehujael, Methusael, Lamech, Adah, Zillah, Jubal, Tabulcain, Naamah. Then come the descendants of the third son, Seth: Enos, Cainan, Mahalaleel, Jared, Enoch, Methuselah, Lamech, Noah, Shem, Ham, and Japheth. In the lifetime of these four latter persons, all life on earth is destroyed in the Flood, and a new lineage begins. After Japheth, Gomer, Magog, Madai, Javan, Tubal, Meshech, Tiras, Ashkenaz, Riphath, Togarmah, Eishah, Tarshiss, Kittim, Dodanim. After Ham, Cush, Mizraim, Phut, Canaan, Seba, Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, Sabtecha, Sheba, Dedan. After Shem, Elam, Ashur, Arphaxad, Lud, Aram, Uz, Hul, Gether, Mash, Salah, Eber, Peleg, Joktan, Almodad, Sheleph, Hazarmaveth, Jerah, Hadoram, Uzal, Diklah, Obal, Abimael, Sheba, Ophir, Havilah, Jobab. After Peleg, Reu, Serug, Nahor, Terah, Abram, Nahor, Haran.

These names connect historical time with the mythic, illuminating as it were the darkness of history and forging a path directly into the moment of creation. The connection is real, if not factual, since there must be some particular point in time at which humanity emerged, and some particular place. Viewed in relation to the age of the earth, that time is not far from the present, some two hundred thousand years, somewhere in the region of ten thousand generations. It occurred on the African continent, where creatures resembling humans had already lived for millions of years, and for a time they must have lived alongside each other, perhaps until only forty thousand years ago. The first humans cannot have been many in number, a few small flocks at most, and they must have kept to the same places until some of them, about a hundred thousand years ago, began to wander, the species gradually spread across the globe.

When in the 1990s scientists began to identify and map our DNA, the paths these early humans wandered could suddenly be followed, deposited in our living bodies here in the present, an unfathomably long chain of inheritance enclosing us all in our history, or exposing us to the very depths of time: not only are we like them, in a sense we are them.

The emergence of the human being was a local occurrence, it took place in a certain geographical area; the idea of the Garden of Eden and man's dispersion from it expresses no more than that. Some caves, plains, forests, some lakes or rivers.

By the time the narrative gets to Abram we are somewhere between historical time and the void of prehistory, and what emerges from Abram are the foundations of a family, a people, and a nation, governed by the will of a single God, who gradually bestows on them laws and statutory instruments, which is to say civilization and religion. The relation between the divine and the nondivine, between man and the world, and between individuals, is regulated within those systems. And the future is a promise of descendants, for God brings Abram forth and says to him, "Look now toward heaven, and tell the stars, if thou be able to number them. So shall thy seed be." And when Abram, who after his covenant with God becomes known as Abraham, is later instructed to sacrifice his only son, God intervenes with that same promise: "That in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of the heaven, and as the sand which is upon the seashore."

The stars and the sand are the mass, the many, but the many are also alike. The promise of God does not apply to all people, it is not humanity as such that is to multiply so infinitely, but Abraham and his kin, which is to say a singular we, and this is what makes God's words a promise and a utopia, since the expansion of a single family, a clan, a people, brings with it power and wealth. By virtue of sheer numbers, land may be conquered and empires won. The Bible's negative representation of innumerableness consists in the swarms of grasshoppers, the great clouds of insects consuming all in their path, unstoppable and merciless.

This distinction between we and they is consistently of the greatest significance throughout the biblical narrative. The Old Testament can be seen as a story issuing out of the various tensions that distinction creates. All the men of Abraham's family shall be circumcised, this being the sign of their belonging, their we, and in the covenant he enters into with God, the promise of their own land is the utopia the later stories seek, until it comes to fruition when before his death Moses sees the Promised Land, overflowing with milk and honey, and his people then cross the river to enter it. Until that point they have been slaves in Egypt, powerless, their lives in the hands of others, and in such a situation, possessing nothing of their own and without influence on their own days, not even on their own children, the only thing that keeps them together is their sense of particularity, the idea of their own, guaranteed to them by God, who is the one God.

The Egyptians murder all male children born to the Hebrews, but when Moses is born he is hidden in an ark among the bulrushes at the river, where he is found by Pharaoh's daughter, who takes him as her own. Not only is he then able to live safely among the Egyptians, he also enjoys the foremost privileges as a member of a hallowed, godlike family, yet so strong is the bond to the people from whom he stems, the slaves, that he renounces all of this, not in any planned or calculated manner, but in an act of passion, his blood brought to the boil when he sees an Egyptian beating a Hebrew; Moses kills the man, buries the body in the sand and flees the country, whereupon God appears before him and a new covenant is entered into. Led by Moses, the Hebrews escape from Egypt into the desert. There the laws and rituals by which they must abide are delivered to them. And they are counted.

That laws are delivered to them is by no means surprising, this being a narrative of foundation, but counting and stating their own number is conspicuous indeed. One could conceive of it as some kind of bookkeeping exercise, an archaic urge to account completely for the situation at hand, where their number must have played a significant role given that they were in the desert at the time, in a landscape where food and drink must have been scarce, and because they were about to invade another land and the number of soldiers at their disposal would be one of the most important factors in determining the outcome. Nonetheless, the preciseness of the number stated seems odd, such exact detail occurring only seldom in the Scriptures, which elsewhere can report a people's suffering through centuries or the destruction of a city in only a single sentence.

The only other place where the text displays such exactness, allowing not a detail to escape, is in the listing of the laws and rituals the priests are to perform. But the laws are universal, immutable, and meant to apply through all time; the Hebrews' number is the opposite, capturing an inconstant entity at a certain point in time, applicable only to them, in that place, when Moses gathers the Israelites in the Sinai Desert. They are many, though not in the way the stars or the grains of sand at the shore are many; in total they number 603,550 able-bodied men spanning twelve tribes and with the following distribution:

> The tribe of Reuben: forty and six thousand and five hundred.
> The tribe of Simeon: fifty and nine thousand and three hundred.
> The tribe of Gad: forty and five thousand and six hundred and fifty.
> The tribe of Judah: threescore and fourteen thousand and six hundred.
> The tribe of Issachar: fifty and four thousand and four hundred.
> The tribe of Zebulun: fifty and seven thousand and four hundred.
> The tribe of Ephraim: forty thousand five hundred.
> The tribe of Manasseh: thirty and two thousand and two hundred.
> The tribe of Benjamin: thirty and five thousand and four hundred.
> The tribe of Dan: threescore and two thousand and seven hundred.
> The tribe of Aser: forty and one thousand and five hundred.
> The tribe of Naphtali: fifty and three thousand and four hundred.

Seen from the outside, as when later they conquer the new land, killing everything in their path, they are a faceless horde, but seen from within, all are bound to the familiar in lines of descent going back through families and through history, which in sum comprise the people.

Reading this ancient text today, perhaps the most remarkable aspect is the way the foundation of the religious merges into the social, as if they were two sides of the same coin. For the number's freezing of the multitude in time is just one aspect of this, what the number represents is another, and it is this that joins number and law together. The number stands open to the boundless, the uncontrollable, the identityless, the infinity of sand and stars; the names constrain and control in the identity of the name, the face of the language. Similarly, the law constrains and controls action; killing is forbidden, being a trangression of life, lying is forbidden, being a transgression of truth, adultery is forbidden, being a transgression of marriage. The punishment is expulsion from life, which is to say death, or, if the transgression is deemed to be minor, a sacrifice in place of death. And the boundary that emerges in this, which separates this people and their existence from all that is holy, is the most important of all, testified to by the text's richness of detail in describing the various rituals, the exactness required when the priests step into the hallowed space and dash blood on the sacrificial stone or burn animals or corn or oil. The sacrifice is not merely a reminder of the price of transgression, is not merely a symbolic act, but is in itself a price, in the way the ox whose head is severed is not merely a symbol of life and blood, but is in itself life and blood. That the language of the Old Testament is so specific, so proximate to physical reality and the events that take place within it, to body rather than spirit, is undoubtedly an aspect of the same thing. What is to be found beyond the holy, the boundless and infinite, is also nameless, indefinite, its identity construed by a verb, which is to say action or movement. I am what I am. The image of the nameless human is a grain of sand or a star, the loss of identity in the mass merely ostensible, for the number of stars or the number of grains of sand is not infinite, but finite, and only from a distance are they the same, seen up close each grain of sand is different, each star unique. They may be counted, and they may be named. The image of the nameless God, however, is infinite and identical, for it is fire. Its manifestations are always the same – to name an instance of fire would seem meaningless, to name a grain of sand would not – and yet each is different. Fire cannot be counted, cannot be named, cannot be delimited; doused in one place, it will burn in another. The stars and the grains of sand express the idea of the one and the all, the individual and the mass, whereas fire establishes identity between the two, the one being simultaneously the one and the all. Beyond the boundaries of law and ritual stands the boundless God, beyond the name stands boundless biological life, only concerted effort can prevent us from disappearing into or being consumed by its depths.

Religion, whose rituals gather together all time, tying it down in their gravity to only a single point in time, lay in this rural past close to the social world, whose horizons lay mere generations backward and forward in time, but whose practices, bound up with the land and the seasons, were mainly associated with repetition. They were distinct from one another regarding the local and the universal, where that which applied to all, that which for example regulated the total population of the earth, existed beyond the reach of humans and was identified in terms of external forces, fate and destiny, so strong that not even the thought arose of their being controllable other than by prayer and sacrifice. In the face of drought, floods, cold, and epidemics, man was vulnerable, fragile, and helpless. The relationship between the local and the universal, between individual and whole, was one-sided in that these mighty and impersonal forces intervened in individual lives, whereas the individual could never encroach on the universal. The universal was religious, rather than social.

When science becomes the language by which man construes the material world, the religious stepping aside to apply only to the spiritual aspect of life, the relationship between the local and the universal becomes radically displaced and ensuing technological progress, which in such an astonishingly short space of time completely alters the circumstances of production and distribution, causes our populations to skyrocket compared to the demographic calm of preceding centuries and millennia. Whereas there were some 250 to 400 million people in the world in 1350, and between 465 and 545 million in 1650, that figure rose to between 835 and 915 million in 1800, between 1 billion 91 million and 1 billion 176 million in 1850, between 1 billion 530 million and 1 billion 608 million in 1900, to 2 billion 416 million in 1950, in the region of 4 billion in 1980, and now, in 2011, to some 6 billion people. We have indeed replenished the earth and subdued it as the account of the creation would have it, and have become as many as the sand upon the seashore and the stars of the heaven.

In a way, such a radical rise in population changes nothing. What it means is simply more of the same. More births and deaths, more mouths and more food, more clothing, more houses, closer together and spread over greater areas of land. Humanity advances in much the same way as a forest, for whose trees the number of other trees changes nothing. The local does not cease to exist as a concept even if connections extend from there into the global, such as when the global market came into being with the Industrial Revolution, when goods began to be produced in one place, to be transported from there out into the wide world, for as the sociologist Bruno Latour puts it in his book We Have Never Been Modern, by following the process step-by-step "one never crosses the mysterious lines that should divide the local from the global." When does the train depart the local and pass into the global, Latour asks, and replies: never. All large organizations and associations comprise local units, armies are for instance organized in much the same way as armies were organized in Roman days, only multiplied, and the same is true of bureaucracy, the apparatus of state, the great commercial and international businesses. They comprise a single person with sweat blotches under his arms and his tie askew person in an office to the power of a thousand or hundreds of thousands. It is not the number in itself that has altered man's circumstance, but our perception of that number.

In the 1680s an anatomy professor of Oxford University, Sir William Petty, wrote a book called Political Arithmetic in which he endeavored to understand or capture society on the basis of mathematical terms, in other words to quantify and measure the sphere of the human. He wished thereby to establish laws to govern what was human, much as Newton had established laws to govern nature. That there should exist an absolute order, a firm set of rules behind the world's apparent chaos of variability and arbitrariness so exact and predictable they could be calculated and accounted for mathematically, was an irresistible thought in the seventeenth century and one that would moreover confirm the greatness of God; as if some hidden plan had existed all along, relating to the world the way a technical drawing related to an invention, in a system in which all fluctuation occurred according to a predetermined pattern where nothing could change and where all constituent parts worked together in a single glorious expression of the wholeness of the universe. Man, belonging to this universe, was a part of the same system, not only in the form of the individual human, with its blood and lungs, its brain and nerve paths, its muscles and tendons, which like cables enabled the arms to be raised and lowered, the legs to walk, but also as a mass, in the structures within which human beings lived, such as villages, cities, and states, where their numbers could be determined precisely, not just those who were living, but also those who died and those who were born – for in viewing such a whole one could see there were rules that governed it. The annual numbers of births and deaths, for instance, were not arbitrary; true, those numbers rose and fell, but they did so on the basis of parameters that could be identified and determined. The same was true of life expectancy.

But what drove society, what drove the people who lived in it, what decided their actions, made their bodies do one thing rather than another? Were there rules for such things that applied to everyone?

If the comparison between the body, society, and clockwork, as made explicitly by both Descartes and Hobbes, seems almost brutally simplistic to our minds, the clock not being a particularly sophisticated machine to us, the mind-set it revealed – the foundation of medical science on the one hand, whereby the body is made up of functional parts that may be exchanged quite mechanically, and the foundations of statistics and societal planning on the other, by which all human activity may be measured and quantified, captured in numbers, providing significant background for political decision-making. The list of numericized phenomena in society is almost endless, and they are broken down in all sorts of ways so that currents within people may be read and either diverted in the case of their being undesirable, or reinforced in the case of their being desirable. One may also see connections between the various parts. These statistics have a cutoff point; it would be meaningless to compile statistics of the number of people within a family killed in traffic or who have died from cancer, for instance, since such occurrences cannot be understood as the expression of anything quantative, because while Johannes belonged to the segment of young men most likely to die in traffic, to his family he was not representative of anyone, he was Johannes, who picked his car keys up off the table in the hallway one afternoon only a month ago and never came back. Not even in a small society, in one of the many village communities that line the coast of northern Norway, for example, with their two or three hundred inhabitants, where everyone knows each other, would the viewpoint of statistics make sense; he was Johannes. But at some point statistics do become meaningful. This is the point at which the observer loses overview of the "we" and can no longer identify the individual within the mass; a teacher in a school of five hundred students knows all those in his class, but not all those in the school, and while in the first instance it is meaningless to compile statistics of what marks the students have been given, the teacher knowing perfectly well how each student has performed in the different subjects, in the second instance, that of student performance in the school as a whole, statistics would indeed be meaningful. The tipping point between the individual and the individual within the mass is the tipping point between the I and the we, though not the personal we, this one borders on another, greater we, which is impersonal, no longer represented by any name, but by a number, and which thereby approaches the "it."

If we imagine humanity in terms of a scale, it would have to begin at one end with the impersonal, the materiality of the body, where in principle all parts are exchangeable, being the same for everyone, and where for that same reason the notion of the individual makes no sense – the human concept would thus proceed from the impersonal I, or the "it" of the I, shading in turn into the personal I, the personal we, and eventually the nonpersonal we, or the "it" of the we, humanity as a mass, the individual as a number.

The boundaries of both the I and the we in respect to the it are fluid and unclear, but nonetheless they are real, for in the it-zones humanity is characterized by sameness, predictability, and near-mathematical regularity, whereas in the I-zones and the we-zones it is quite differently free and individualized. The world of the inner "it" is that of biology, where thoughts are interactions between cells, emotions are chemical and electric impulses shooting through the nerve fibers, existing alongside all other bodily processes, which lie beyond their scope and cannot think or feel on their own, unless communication between the DNA spiral and the cell is a form of thinking at the most fundamental level of life, the one's duplication in the other, but no matter what it is or what it is called, it takes place at such depths within us that we neither feel, sense, understand, nor see it other than as a result, which is to say that which is brought forth within us.

These systems are uniform, what applies to one, applies to all, and they are continuous in the sense of their being transmitted as copies down through the generations. Their process is mechanical, a kind of biological-material industry, immeasurably finely tuned of course, and yet material, for which reason it has always been just a matter of time before human industry and its mechanical technology became sufficiently finely tuned to be applied inward, to ourselves. Its tentative beginnings were sometime in the Middle Ages, proceeding with astonishing velocity when religion no longer accounted for nature and man could intervene and take matters into his own hands, familiarize himself with nature's laws and principles, and its first practical results were crude Prometheus-like machines, monsters of iron and steel into which coal was shoveled, clouds of vapor and smoke billowing from their innards, but which were quickly refined and reduced in size until reaching such a level of sophistication as to be able to not only isolate our human cells and strings of DNA, mapping our entire microscopic genetic material, but also to intervene and modify it, altering and eventually manufacturing it too. These systems, which comprise the foundations of our self-awareness and our spirit, are biological and thereby mortal, and in them the I expires, which is not necessarily to say that I thereby am "it": we may feel the heart to be ours, but if our heart should falter, it has been shown that we can insert a new one, from a dead person, and go on living. We are not our hearts, we are not our arm, all we need to do is chop it off and look at it there on the table, what could such a blood-drenched object possibly have to do with me? We are constrained by this darkness of flesh and brightness of eye, by the insensitive beating of this simple heart, by the air inhaled and exhaled by the dismal gray twins that are these lungs, we are unthinkable without them, yet they live within themselves and do not know us, for they know no one, and the muscles cannot tell if their twitching occurs in someone dead or someone alive.

The difference between the "it" of the I and the "it" of the we is considerable. Whereas the former occurs in the material domain, the latter is relational, and while the former is therefore mortal, the latter is immortal in the sense that it lives on even when the individual dies. What they share is predictability and regularity, which in their different ways exclude the individual, and which in their different ways are associated with the extrahuman, characterized by the forces or phenomena that pervade great totalities, previously understood as powers, in the former instance those which give rise to life's beginnings and life's course, in the latter instance fate, by which it is steered.

When does here become there? asks Michel Serres. To which might be added, when do we become they? The notion of the local is geographic, but social too. The geographic sense, the space of the local, is defined by constraints. The walls of a city are such a constraint. The hedge around a house. And property rights attach people to place: room, house, farm, manor. Mine, yours, ours, theirs. Through the ages our world has been rural, consisting of small, bounded societies where all social structures were centered around the notion of the local, where people normally died in the same place they were born, rarely having ventured far from the area in which they lived their entire lives. In such a society, a German village in the fourteenth century for instance, knowledge was local too; since only a minority could read and write, that knowledge was transmitted orally and through practice, residing in the memory of the mind and the memory of the hands, bound up with the circumstances determined by its particular landscape, whether the occurrence of a certain type of rock in a quarry or a mine, the quality of the soil, or the types of trees in the forests. The idea that some kind of scientific industry could arise in one such place, a German village in the fourteenth century, or that some kind of machine, a combustion engine perhaps, a sewing machine or a microwave oven, could ever be made here is unthinkable, precisely because of the local nature of the circumstances and the shape they accorded all knowledge there. Constrained by the limitations of individual memory, the theory required would have been impossible to attain, each and every person would have had to start from scratch, on the basis of their own capabilities alone, and nearly all knowledge gained would be lost again when its host died. All text, all theory and philosophy was in such a world gathered in the hands of the few, all manuscripts were copied out by hand and existed only in very few locations, usually monasteries, and from the thirteenth century onward in the new universities of the major cities. From these environments came the alchemists, who like Paracelsus dabbled in this and that, and the itinerant Faust figure, whose knowledge was indeed systematic but bound to a community so narrow that all experimental endeavor was undertaken alone and without connection to other such endeavors, a circumstance that could hardly lead to anything but the repetition of each other's errors.

The new has to be required or desired, it must afford clear-cut advantages, and when the impulse toward the new arises, communities must be found in which it may be developed and maintained. Within local boundaries the new would be extinguished like embers on a stone. The new is possible only in structures where the local is dissolved. In the case of knowledge, the great advance occurred in Germany in the fifteenth century with the invention of the printing press, which enabled the reproduction of any book or any treatise, as well as its dissemination into the world, and then everything no longer hinged on the one or the few. Knowledge could be accumulated in ways until then unknown, to the point where no single individual could ever acquire even a fraction of that circulating in his or her lifetime. A theory put forward in one place could be strengthened or invalidated in another, no longer was it a matter of having to start from scratch every time, and once a small number of principles concerning verifiability and universality, and thereby comparison, were established, this overarching system meant that inventions could be made that no individual would ever have been able to create on his own, the train for example, or the machine gun. Nature was released from religion, knowledge was released from the local, and once freed these forces blew like the wind through the domain of the human.

"All people" was no longer a religious concept, but biological and social. The realization of biological sameness, the body as materiality, consisting of calculable and thereby manipulable parts amenable to instrumental and gradually chemical intervention, was without issue, posing no threat to the old religious division between body and soul; on the contrary this seemed consolidated: the I belonged to the flesh, and if its life could be prolonged by someone cutting into the chest and cleansing the heart of calcium, then all the better for it. The realization of social sameness, man as mass, it too consisting of calculable and thereby manipulable parts, it too amenable to intervention, was however not without issue, since the threat it posed to the I concerned not moderation but extinction, and in a strange way set previously well-defined concepts such as worthiness and goodness in flux.

All these currents through the centuries, and everything they brought with them, which can be seen as the dissolution of the local, were for the good. But with it all, in the midst of the human domain, came a shadow, something not for the good. Societal structures change, urban centers balloon, the young pack their belongings and leave for the city to seek their fortunes, and this goes on everywhere. One by one they have made the decision, but together they form a mass, each becomes another face in the flow, on their way to and from the factories, where they perform tasks that can be performed by anyone, or to and from their rooms, which are as good as identical. Smoke pours from the factory chimneys and settles in clouds upon the cities and towns, the streets are full of people, many are poor, and in the districts they inhabit, which are occasionally slum-like, hunger ensues, and the deepest hardship. Hunger is nothing new, nor the sense of powerlessness in its presence, but in previous times it was something inflicted from the outside, in the shape of floods, droughts, or cold, whose forces were ascribed to fate or to the heavenly powers, and as such were a part of man's given circumstance. This new circumstance, this new hardship, comes from people themselves, and thereby fate and the heavenly powers are drawn into the human domain, which in a way has taken on their responsibility: illness need not be fatal, it may be cured by human intervention, epidemics can be prevented, famine need not decimate a population, there being more efficient ways now to cultivate the land, making it possible to increase food production to the extent that there is now a safety margin, reinforced by a hugely improved infrastructure that means humans are no longer as dependent on local conditions. Poverty is no longer down to the heavenly powers, but to the people. This culpability cannot be isolated, cannot be attributed to this or that person or a particular group of persons, nor may it be localized to any particular place, for the consequence not only runs over from the actions of the one into those of the all, it also runs over from the local into the global, the invention of the spinning wheel being one example, basically a local occurrence, an idea conceived by a small number of individuals somewhere in England, quite innocuous on its own but with shattering consequence for all corners of society, its ramifications felt throughout the Western world, where the same thing occurs, the population explodes, the cities swell, work becomes mechanized, the market turns global – all these processes apparently unstoppable, unmanageable, incalculable, happening seemingly on their own. The blame for poverty, need, sickness belonged to no one, it was contained in the system, and if its consequences were to be prevented or modified, the system itself had to be identified and changed.

This was what Marx and Engels did: they identified the system, anchored it in history, and oriented it toward a utopian future. But a system is not human, it has no face, and "all" is by no means an unproblematic quantity, not even when divided into classes. There is no doubt that poverty and need were structurally determined, the work of a large societal group benefiting a small societal group, because if "all" is primary, "all" in the sense of a class of people living under the same circumstances and conditions, which is to say defined on the basis of what is common to them, their sameness, if it is the good of this "all" that matters, their common conditions that must be improved and changed, measured statistically in terms of average life expectancy, average child mortality, average income, average working hours, average living area, average food consumption, which are the parameters employed in Das Kapital to show and account for the inhuman conditions under which the working class lived, if the circumstances of the one are of secondary importance, then it is the good of the community that counts, the individual workers construed as a class or sum, and all atrocities that later took place in the name of communism, whether under Lenin, Stalin, or Mao, are a consequence, however unpredictably brutal, of that thought. The collectivization of agriculture was meant to benefit everyone, any hardship suffered by the individual in that context was of secondary importance. The same is true of the relocation of intellectuals during the Cultural Revolution.

How can the idea of a society in which everyone is equal and enjoys the same rights lead to the Gulag? Was the indignation Jack London felt on seeing the extreme poverty of the London slums misguided? Are we not to feel solidarity with others and try to help them in their need?

When hardship rises above a certain level it becomes unmanageable for the individual: even if London or Marx had spent their entire time working for the improvement of the slums and had donated their last pennies to the cause, their efforts would have been little more than a drop in the ocean. The poverty, violence, and need they saw were structural and could only be tackled and managed structurally. The premise of Marxism was that society's enormous problems, with large numbers of the population living in deplorable conditions, had to do with the distribution of social assets; as such the solutions it proposed were materialistic in nature. The issue consisted not of the forms of mass production, but of who controlled the means of production, which was not only determinative of inequality in terms of economic opportunity and huge differences in living standards, but also the alienation of the individual, which was a function of the extent to which the individual could dispose of his or her own labor. The idea was that a radical upheaval in the conditions of production would precipitate an equally radical upheaval of social conditions, evening out all economic inequalities and ensuring equal distribution of privilege, making each individual equal. However, if the main problem of industrialism was not the distribution of material wealth but was instead concerned with the reduction of the human, in a staggering process of shrinkage toward the material that all but appropriated the life of the individual, Marxism's solution was not utopian at all, but a continuation of the nightmare by other means.

Marxism was also a matter of identity in which the association of the I with the we lay not in the local dimension, following geographical boundaries, but in the new working class, which by the middle of the nineteenth century had spread throughout the Western countries, and the aim was for the revolution, the process of overturning the "they" and incorporating them into the "we," to span the world. The communist I located itself between the international we of the workers and the national they of the bourgeoisie, for while the wealth of the ruling classes knew no bounds, the self was certainly more constrained – it is by no means coincidental that the swelling I of the Romantic age, the genius and unrivaled human, emerges at the start of the nineteenth century, at the very outset of industrialism: people are becoming increasingly numerous and more alike, the unique and the local are diminishing, the concept of the mass human appears, and as if to counter this threat to the individual the grand I steps forth. The Gothic horror fiction of the same period concerns this very theme.

E. T. A. Hoffmann, who sensed more clearly than most the depths of the collective nightmare, wrote about automata so human in their appearance one could fall in love with them, and moreover about doppelgängers; Bram Stoker wrote about a person unable to die; Mary Shelley wrote about a scientist who created a human. The gripping fear of sameness encroaching upon the unique is the same fear of the inhuman encroaching upon the human, of nonlife encroaching upon life. Boundaries create distinctions, distinctions create meaning, and it is for this reason man's primeval fear is of the undifferentiated: in the domain of the undifferentiated everything is erased. To consider the unprecedented emphasis placed by the Romantics on the singular I, to which concept its construction of the genius belongs, as a way of compensating for the absence of God from the world, as well as of facing the increasing pressure of a growing sense of undifferentiation, is perhaps speculative, though not without justification; the work of Stoker, Shelley, and Hoffmann, expressions of their age, are about the boundary between the human and the nonhuman, and consider the distinction to be under threat.

These two great shifts of identity in the nineteenth century, toward the unique in the one instance and the undistinguished all in the other, were mutually exclusive, an impossible equation. Not the I and the we in themselves, but the perspectives on the human each entailed. The construal of man in terms of the mass, with its accentuation of sameness, arises out of the external and is conveyed by the external's language, which is the language of mathematics and the natural sciences, whereas the construal of man as unique and grand arises out of the internal I and its language. The signficance of the national is part of the same identity complex, where the concepts of nation and people not only constrain and make manageable the we, but also aggrandize that we in their turning toward history, which is consistently heroic. As such it is a direct reply of sorts to the dissolution of the structures of the local, the heroic occurred here rather than there, within a people from whom we descend, so belonging to us, as opposed to something that occurred there, among them.

The grand I of the Romantic age reinforces the name. The mass human of industrialism reinforces the number. The opposition has always existed; the line of motion from teeming, crawling life to the two named humans is all about this: differentiation, distinction, the accordance of meaning. The function of the sacrifice is of a different quality, not undermining the collective, not turned toward the individual, as in the case of the name, but establishing difference within and according meaning to the collective as a whole. But the function of the sacrifice changes too. The primitive nature of Abel's offering and Cain's fratricide, expressing in a single image the violence that issues from sameness, becomes cultivated and complex in the story of Abraham's offering of his son, there no longer being anything absolute about either the sacrifice or the God to whom it is offered, since God rejects the offering, and what's a rejected sacrifice worth? There are many signs that primitive cultures initially sacrificed humans, but later substituted animals, though not just any animal, they were always domesticated and thereby proximate to man's daily life. The story of Abraham seems almost to express that very transition. But there is more to it than that. There is no explicit involvement of the collective here, only Abraham, his son, and their God. God, the almighty creator of the universe, its very gestalt, who in demanding human sacrifice has demanded the inhuman, and Abraham, willing to sacrifice his son, thereby placing something else, God's name and honor, higher than death, and in that way overcoming death by not allowing it to be the ultimate end. Something in life is greater than death, therefore life may be sacrificed. Had he killed his son, he would have done so out of love – for God, but also for his son. When God rescinds the command and Abraham aborts this sacrifice of his dearest to the highest, his son thereby living on, another love arises, that between father and son, not concentrated in any pillar of fire, the very flash point of life and death, but spread out over endless days, so much time that it is continually being erased, and so near as to hardly be noticed, for in his son a father sees himself, and in his father a son sees himself, what belongs to one and what to the other is not always easy to say, and he who was below will one day be above, and he who was above will one day be below.

The story of Abraham's sacrifice of his son is one of the strangest in the Bible, not only because it is so unfathomable, for all mythological narratives are unfathomable, but because it departs from the absolute, generally a fundamental of mythic and religious narratives, a departure that is not merely peripheral to the story but which manifests itself at its very center. God is an absolute being, the sacrifice an absolute action. But here the sacrifice is not an absolute action, it is rescinded. God's command to Abraham is a test, and the locus of significance is displaced, shifted from the sacrifice itself to the willingness to sacrifice, which is to say from the connection between the human and the divine to the human. Sacrifice is never merely a loss, for something is always gained by sacrifrice, so what did Abraham lose when the command was rescinded? What he lost was the absolute, and triumph over death. In other words, he lost the uttermost meaning of life. What then did he gain? What he gained was the innermost meaning of life, his son's life, properly inalienable, but this in a world where "properly" conceals itself in the open and is not given like the offering, but instead must be taken. It is a conquest too, of human worth, as the Old Testament is a narrative on the same subject. That the relationship between the divine and the human is so ambivalent, the worldly weight of the mortal earth, pulling the divine toward the terrestrial amid the whirling sand and dust of the antiabsolute, which may also be seen as the opposite, the endeavor of the trivial toward the hallowed, forever halted in midflight, rescinded, half workday, half festival, half man, half god, petty at one moment, almighty the next, is what makes Judaism a religion of doubt, hesitancy, and postponement – and of ambivalence, for the forces of the opposite are always present too, in the symmetry of this clearest image of revenge: eye, eye, tooth, tooth.

If, with Girard, one considers the narrative of the life and teachings of Christ to be the consummation of the long story that is the Old Testament, it is in this respect particularly that the line of progression comes to an end, for what the New Testament means above all is the discontinuance of the notion of vengeance, the end of uncontrollable violence. Turn the other cheek, says Jesus, and this is the symmetry of the good, the one no more faced against the other, but turned toward his neighbor, which is to say that the other is no longer construed as a threat or danger, but as a part of the self.

The New Testament scene that measures up to the story of Cain and Abel, or that of Abraham and Isaac, is when Jesus stands up to the crowd as they are about to stone a woman accused of adultery. For Girard this scene is the conclusive curbing of the forces of mimetic violence. Jesus finds himself in the scapegoat's position, the one surrounded by the all, but instead of being destroyed by them he turns to face them, dispersing the crowd by means of a single utterance. Stoning is the manifestation of retribution and based on duplication, both ritual insofar as stoning is employed in all such cases of transgression, and individual insofar as everyone takes an active part. What Jesus says to them is simple: "He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her." By that utterance he redirects responsibility for the act of violence to each and every one of them as individuals, and the collective dissolves. There is no all, only the one, responsible for his or her own actions.

But the good, and solicitude for one's neighbor and the dissolution of violence in forgiveness is indeed good, is not an expression of civilization, but of something radically different. The good does not solve the problem of violence, it is not instrumental in the way civilization's laws and institutions are instrumental, but the very opposite, a socially solvent force. The antithesis of violence is not the good, but the social. That equation does not work out, for violence exists within the social, embedded in the differences inherent to the domain, but it is the best we can do, and the violence on whose basis Girard construes his notions of taboo and ritual, the violence within, which tears the community apart from the inside, is something we control, the systems we have established deal with it, and it no longer poses any real threat to us. The control of such violence was made possible by transferring responsibility to the individual, in turn leading to the disintegration of our knowledge of the collective, for this was no longer neeeded, but with the huge population swell that occurred toward the end of the nineteenth century, flooding at the tidelines of the new structures of industrialism, came its violence, unprecedented in scope within that system – at no point in our world history have so many been systematically oppressed as at the close of the nineteenth century – utterly out of control, yet deriving from a single point, in itself insignificant and innocuous, the assassination of an archduke by a lone fanatic, sparking first regionally, a crisis in Austria-Hungary, then nationally, then internationally, and in the space of weeks the whole of Europe was at war, a war no one wanted and no one needed, profoundly destructive at every conceivable level, with no one able to prevent it, its avoidance beyond the scope of any single individual, and the violence it brought with it escalated out of all control. People who otherwise cooperated and collaborated, whose interests and goals were shared, destroyed each other with such attention to detail, such savagery and in such numbers as to eclipse all previous wars – and at last, when it was all over, it had taken eight million people with it. It was a storm of destruction impossible to command, as if it were taking place outside the domain of the human, and yet it was not, these were the very forces of human nature manifesting themselves, the same forces of which ancient cultures had been so fearful, for if they found form they would reproduce themselves and spread, and threaten to destroy everyone and everything entirely. This was the violence within, violence among like kind, but on a whole new scale and with new, serially manufactured weapons that redefined death in its image: serially manufactured, industrial.

The Hitler we know was created by World War I. Nothing he became or did afterward can be explained without reference to that background. The war became a home to him; he did not apply for leave until he had lived in the trenches for two years, not because he was ineligible but because he didn't want to.

When Germany capitulated in November 1918 he was receiving treatment at a military hospital in Pomerania. He was shattered by the news. He wanted to fight until the last, anything else would destroy the foundation of everything he believed in. When the peace came, without defeat in battle, he saw it only as an act of faithless villainy. This is how he describes it in Mein Kampf:

> The next few days came and with them the most terrible certainty of my life. The rumors became more and more oppressive. What I had taken for a local affair was now said to be a general revolution. To this was added the disgraceful news from the front. They wanted to capitulate. Was such a thing really possible?
> On November 10, the pastor came to the hospital for a short address: now we learned everything.
> In extreme agitation, I, too, was present at the short speech. The dignified old gentleman seemed a-tremble as he informed us that the House of Hollenzollern should no longer bear the German imperial crown; that the fatherland had become a "republic"; that we must pray to the Almighty not to refuse His blessing to this change and not to abandon our people in the times to come. He could not help himself, he had to speak a few words in memory of the royal house. He began to praise its services in Pomerania, in Prussia, nay, to the German > fatherland, and – here he began to sob gently to himself – in the little hall the deepest dejection settled on all hearts, and I believe that not an eye was able to restrain its tears. But when the old gentleman tried to go on, and began to tell us that we must now end the long War, yes, that now that it was lost and we were throwing ourselves upon the mercy of the victors, our fatherland would for the future be exposed to dire oppression, that the armistice should be accepted with confidence in the magnanimity of our previous enemies, I could stand it no longer. It became impossible for me to sit still one minute more. Again everything went black before my eyes; I tottered and groped my way back to the dormitory, threw myself on my bunk, and dug my burning head into my blanket and pillow.

> Since the day when I had stood at my mother's grave, I had not wept.

His rage and ignominy at what he saw as a breach of faith formed the engine of hatred that drove his later political ideas and actions; without it they are unthinkable. The scene in which he buries his face in his pillow and weeps transforms into an ominous, heavily laden picture of the consequences of that breach:

> And so it had all been in vain. In vain all the sacrifices and privations; in vain the hunger and thirst of months which were often endless; in vain the hours in which, with mortal fear clutching at our hearts, we nevertheless did our duty; and in vain the death of two millions who died. Would not the graves of all the hundreds of thousands open, the graves of those who with faith in the fatherland had marched forth never to return? Would they not open and send the silent mud- and blood-covered heroes back as spirits of vengeance to the homeland which had cheated them with such mockery of the highest sacrifice which a man can make to his people in this world?

This host of spirits, these two million dead soldiers covered with mud and blood, were indeed to come home and haunt Germany, it was in order to restore their honor and accord meaning to their sacrifice that Hitler rearmed the nation in the thirties; defeat was to be avenged, the old enemies and the traitors who had worked for peace were to be crushed, but it was also because the war in itself had been so significant to him and so many of his generation. Nazism was also a death cult and a warrior cult; this gruesome image, the graves opening, the fallen rising up, bloodied and smeared with mud, as spirits of vengeance, was later to find further expression in the skull-and-crossbones symbolism of the SS.

In contrast to the majority he had nothing to come back to when the war ended, so what he did was to remain in the military, for besides meaning and direction the army had given him food, lodgings, and a well-defined job of work to carry out for four years. He went back to Munich and reenlisted with the reserve battalion of the infantry regiment with which he had served.

After returning to Munich, Hitler was assigned duty as a prison-camp guard for two months, subsequently carrying out guard duty at the city's Hauptbahnhof, and was selected as a representative of his company. In the spring of 1919, following a period of civil unrest, he was picked out by the officer in charge of an army information department, a captain by the name of Karl Mayr, whose job it was to monitor suspicious political elements, which is to say the radical left, and to combat subversion within army ranks. Hitler was undergoing an anti-Bolshevik "instruction course," Kershaw writes, and it was on this occasion his rhetorical talents first came to notice. A lecturer on the course, a Professor von Müller, mentioned these and pointed him out to Mayr, who recognized Hitler immediately as "Hitler from the List Regiment." Later, Mayr would write, "he was like a tired stray dog looking for a master . . . ready to throw in his lot for anyone who would show him kindness," Toland reports. The most remarkable thing about this description of Hitler, however, is that at this time he was "totally unconcerned about the German people and their destinies." This was hardly the fact of the matter; what Mayr observed was that Hitler was not talking about it. Introverted, silent, troubled, pale, without purpose – a stray dog hungry for kindness. Mayr gave him that kindness, or at least a small measure of purpose: toward the end of the summer Hitler was giving his own pro-nationalist, anti-Bolshevik "course" at a military camp outside Augsburg. In Hitler's own words:

> One day I asked for the floor. One of the participants felt obliged to break a lance for the Jews and began to defend them in lengthy arguments. This aroused me to an answer. The overwhelming majority of the students present took my standpoint. The result was that a few days later I was sent into a Munich regiment as a so-called "educational officer."
> I started out with the greatest enthusiasm and love. For all at once I was offered an opportunity of speaking before a larger audience; and the thing that I had always presumed from pure feeling without knowing it was now corroborated: I could "speak." My voice, too, had grown so much better that I could be sufficiently understood at least in every corner of the small squad rooms.
> No task could make me happier than this, for now before being discharged I was able to perform useful services to the institution which had been so close to my heart: the army.
> And I could boast of some success: in the course of my lectures I led many hundreds, indeed thousands, of comrades back to their people and fatherland. I "nationalized" the troops and was thus also able to help strengthen the general discipline.
> Here again I became acquainted with a number of like-minded comrades, who later began to form the nucleus of the new movement.

That he ever held the position of "educational officer" is a misrepresentation, and the number of students he lectured is grossly exaggerated, but his teaching was undoubtedly a success and his talent for winning over an audience was demonstrable. Professor von Müller describes the moment he first saw Hitler hold forth:

> [A small group were] riveted to a man in their midst who, with a strangely guttural voice incessantly and with mounting passion, spoke to them. I had the > peculiar feeling that the excitement generated by his performance at the same time gave him his voice. I saw a pallid, gaunt face under strands of hair hanging down in unmilitary fashion. He had a close-cropped moustache and strikingly large, light blue, fanatically cold, glowing eyes.

Hitler's task was to give lectures to his fellow soldiers and to monitor the teeming numbers of political parties which had arisen in Munich at that time. It was in this latter capacity, in the autumn of 1919, that he attended a meeting of a small party called the German Workers' Party, whose political program was a blend of nationalism, socialism, and anti-Semitism, combating internationalism and Judaism its two primary causes. Shortly after this meeting Hitler applied for membership of the party, which would soon change its name to the German National Socialist Workers' Party, swelling from a few dozen members at the time of Hitler joining to become the largest political party in Germany in the space of little more than a decade.

Four days after his membership was accepted, Hitler was ordered by Mayr to respond to an inquiry the department had received from a former participant in one of the instruction courses asking for a clarification of "the Jewish Question." Hitler provided a lengthy and meticulous reply, writing that the Jews were a race, not a religion, and that anti-Semitism had to be based not on sentiment but on fact. An emotional reaction would lead to pogroms, whereas anti-Semitism based on reason had to lead to a systematic removal of the rights of the Jews. The "final aim," he concluded, "must unshakeably be the removal of the Jews altogether."

Three years later, in autumn 1922, the American ambassador to Germany dispatched a man to Munich to compile a report on the new and prospering National Socialist party and its leader, Adolf Hitler. The attaché's name was Truman Smith and his specific brief was to meet Hitler and provide an assessment of his character, personality, abilities, and weaknesses, as well as to investigate the strengths and potentialities of his party, the NSDAP.

The United States consul in Munich, Robert Murphy, informed Smith that Hitler was a "pure and simple adventurer," though nevertheless believed he was "a real character and is exploiting all latent discontent"; still it was questionable whether he was "big enough to take the lead in a German national movement," as Toland reports. At the invitation of newspaper editor Max Erwin von Scheubner-Richter, a member of Hitler's inner circle who assured him that the party's anti-Semitism was purely propaganda, Smith witnessed Hitler's inspection of storm troopers in front of the new party headquarters:

> A remarkable sight indeed. Twelve hundred of the toughest roughnecks I have ever seen in my life pass in review before Hitler at the goose step under the old Reichflag wearing red armbands with Hakenkreuzen. Hitler, following the review, makes a speech . . . then shouts, "Death to the Jews!" etc. and etc. There was frantic cheering. I never saw such a sight in my life.

Three days later, on the morning of November 22, Smith meets Hitler in person, and is given an outline of the party's politics. During the meeting Hitler states that "only a dictatorship can bring Germany to its feet," and that it was > much better for America and England that the decisive struggle between our civilization and Marxism be fought out on German soil rather than on American and English soil. If we (America) do not help German Nationalism, Bolshevism will conquer Germany. Then there will be no more reparations and Russian and German Bolshevism, out of motives of self-preservation, must attack the Western nations.

While also discoursing on other subjects, Toland writes, Hitler avoids mentioning the Jews at all, until Smith asks him outright, Hitler disarmingly replying that he merely favors the withdrawal of citizenship and their exclusion from public affairs. By the time their meeting ended, Smith was convinced Hitler was going to be an important factor in German politics. Before leaving, Smith accepted a ticket from the party press secretary, Rosenberg, to a speech Hitler was giving that same evening. As it turned out, he was unable to attend, being called back to his embassy and having a train to catch, for which reason he passed his ticket on to Ernst Hanfstaengl, a Munich contact of Warren Robbins, who was a counselor at the embassy; the two had studied together at Harvard. Hanfstaengl's father was German, his mother American, both families belonging to the highest echelons of their respective societies. His mother was of old New England stock, his maternal grandmother was the cousin of General Sedgwick, who fell in the Civil War, his maternal grandfather was General William Heine, originally from Dresden, also a Civil War veteran, and a pallbearer at the funeral of Abraham Lincoln. Hanfstaengl's mother remembered the funeral and her father being visited in Dresden by Wagner and Liszt. On his father's side, two generations of Hanfstaengls had served as privy councillors to the Dukes of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, and the family were well-known patrons of the arts; his grandfather founded an art publishing house and had moreover photographed three German Kaisers, Moltke, Liszt, and Wagner, as well as Ibsen, and the family home in Munich was a favored rendezvous for such luminaries as Richard Strauss, Fridtjof Nansen, and Mark Twain. Hanfstaengl was in other words a person for whom the world stood open, a member of Munich's cultural glitterati as well as that of the American northeastern seaboard; during his time at Harvard he had met two American presidents, the then-incumbent Theodore Roosevelt, as well as his later successor, Franklin D. Roosevelt, not to mention the poet T. S. Eliot, a fact he makes abundantly clear in the blustering introduction to his memoirs, first published in the United States in 1957.

It was Hanfstaengl who took Smith to the train in Munich that November evening in 1922, meeting Rosenberg, who gave Hanfstaengl Smith's ticket to the evening's event and accompanied him to the venue. Hanfstaengl describes Rosenberg as "a sallow, untidy fellow, who looked half-Jewish in an unpleasant sort of way." They take a tram to the Kindl Keller beer hall, which is packed. Hanfstaengl sits down at the press table and asks one of the reporters there where Hitler is. The man points; Hitler is seated next to Max Amann, a sergeant from his old regiment, and Anton Drexler, founder of the party Hitler joined three years before. Hanfstaengl's first impression is this:

> In his heavy boots, dark suit, and leather waistcoat, semistiff white collar and odd little moustache, he really did not look very impressive – like a waiter in a railway-station restaurant.

When Drexler introduces Hitler, a roar of applause goes up. Hitler straightens up and walks past the press table to the platform with a "swift, controlled step, the unmistakable soldier in mufti." The atmosphere is electric, Hanfstaengl writes, and the speech Hitler proceeds to give is brilliant.

> No one who judges his capacity as a speaker from the performances of his later years can have any true insight into his gifts. As time went on he became drunk with his own oratory before vast crowds and his voice lost its former character through the intervention of microphone and loudspeaker. In his early years he had a command of voice, phrase, and effect which has never been equaled, and on this evening he was at his best.
> In a quiet, reserved voice he drew a picture of what had happened in Germany since November 1918: the collapse of the monarchy and the surrender at Versailles; the founding of the Republic on the ignominy of war guilt; the fallacy of international Marxism and Pacifism; the eternal class war leitmotif and the resulting hopeless stalemate between employers and employees, between Nationalists and Socialists.
> As he felt the audience becoming interested in what he had to say, he gently moved his left foot to one side, like a soldier standing at ease in slow motion, and started to use his hands and arms in gesture, of which he had an extensive and expressive repertoire. There was none of the barking and braying he later developed, and he had an ingenious, mocking humor which was telling without being offensive.

Hitler criticizes the Kaiser for being a weakling, he criticizes the Weimar Republicans for accepting the victors' demands, which were stripping Germany of everything but the graves of those who perished in the trenches. He compares the separatist movement and religious exclusivity of the Catholic Church in Bavaria with the comradeship of the soldiers on the front line, who never asked a wounded comrade his religion before leaping to his aid. He speaks at length on the subjects of patriotism and national pride, highlighting Kemal Atatürk in Turkey and Benito Mussolini in Italy as examples to be followed. He hits out at war profiteers and receives roaring applause as he tears them apart for wasting valuable foreign currency on importing oranges from Italy at the same time as half the country goes hungry because of inflation. He attacks the Jews, who are becoming fat on the misery of others, and he lashes out against the communists and socialists for wanting to disrupt German traditions.

> I looked round at the audience. Where was the nondescript crowd I had seen only an hour before? What was suddenly holding these people, who, on the hopeless incline of the falling mark, were engaged in a daily struggle to keep themselves within the line of decency? The hubbub and mug-clattering had stopped and they were drinking in every word. Only a few yards away was a young woman, her eyes fastened on the speaker. Transfixed as though in some devotional ecstasy, she had ceased to be herself and was completely under the spell of Hitler's despotic faith in Germany's future greatness.

When the speech was over Hanfstaengl went up to introduce himself to Hitler, who was still standing on the platform.

> Naïve and yet forceful, obliging and yet uncompromising, he stood, face and hair soaked in perspiration, his semistiff collar, fastened with a square imitation-gold safety pin, melted to nothing. While talking he dabbed his face with what had once been a handkerchief, glancing worriedly at the many open exits through which came the drafts of a cold November night.
> "Herr Hitler, my name is Hanfstaengl," I said. "Captain Truman Smith asked me to give you his best wishes." "Ah yes, the big American," he answered. "He begged me to come here and listen to you, and I can only say I have been most impressed," I went on. "I agree with 95 percent of what you said and would very much like to talk to you about the rest some time."
> "Why, yes, of course," Hitler said. "I am sure we shall not have to quarrel > about the odd 5 percent." He made a very pleasant impression, modest and friendly. So we shook hands again and I went home.

There are many descriptions of Hitler's speeches from this time. Hanfstaengl's is special because he belongs to the apex of society, not the usual beer-hall crowd that is most often Hitler's audience, and the fact that he is so taken by Hitler's gifts indicates that the vulgar and tasteless, brutally simple strokes of Mein Kampf were absent from his public appearances. Hanfstaengl recognizes that Hitler is petty bourgeois, but also that as a speaker he is unconstrained by the fact, rising above it by virtue of his magnetism and oratorical skills, the almost hypnotic charisma he so obviously possesses, and is thereby able to capture the imagination of almost every member of the crowd, regardless of class. At the same time his petty-bourgeois nature is a crucial factor, for as Hanfstaengl thinks to himself that night, unable to sleep after listening to Hitler for the first time:

> Where all our conservative politicians and speakers were failing abysmally to establish any contact with the ordinary people, this self-made man, Hitler, was clearly succeeding in presenting a non-Communist program to exactly those people whose support we needed.

Once Hitler is encouraged to speak in public, finds the confidence and discovers that he is able to, and that people are interested in what he has to say, he is for the first time free to explore his abilities. He is now able to mine his inner being without the destructive checks and balances of the brain, existing simply in the moment, and that feeling of control, of mastery and skill, must surely have filled him to the brim. He is thirty years old and yet to experience success in anything to which he has applied himself. In fact he has failed in every endeavor, until now, stepping onto the platform and looking out at the crowd of people in the room in front of him. His sensitivity, which is so great and which compels him to sever himself from other people completely, either by withdrawing, avoiding the gaze of others, keeping to himself, or by talking incessantly to keep everyone at arm's length, this sensitivity, so unmanageable in the face of an individual you, now comes into its own, perhaps for the first time in his life, for while he is so aware of that you as to shut it out entirely, with near-autistic compulsion, his awareness of the we is quite as intense, and to this we, which is unthreatening, he is able to open himself. He opens himself to the we, heedful of what it says, sensing every nuance of its mood and playing on its strings, for he is not himself a part of this we, but stands outside it, rousing it, stirring it into life, taking it here, taking it there, and he is able to do so because he has always stood outside it. In order to see something, one must see from outside.

Only someone who stands outside the social world knows what the social world is; to those within it, it is like water to a fish. Hitler rejects the singular you, and stands outside the we, and yet he longs for it, and it is this longing his audiences sense when he speaks, the longing for the we being the very foundation of the human, swelling in times of crisis, swelling in chaos, as it did in the Germany of the 1920s, and in Hitler it burns fiercely indeed. There is no need to listen to what he says, his audience were oblivious too, but to the way he says it, the emotions by which he is filled, this is what they react to, this is what they feel, and they drink it up like water. Oh, this longing for community, this longing to be equal, this longing to belong. The simplest is the truest, and this is the truth of Hitler, his longing to be a part of the we touches something deep within that we itself – all accounts of his speeches from this time focus on the same thing, the way his raucous beer-hall audiences, for all their shouting and scuffling, their whooping and howling, hush and fall calm, and become as one. The simplest is the truest, and hatred of the Jews represents the simplest thing of all, the we's need of a they, the basic mimetic structure of violence, the one against the other, duplicated in ritual, us against them, the sacrifice of a they in order that the we may prevail. That need too swells in crisis, swells in chaos, one of the fundamental forms of culture, a condition to which we continue to return. For Hitler, longing for the we is also a longing for the war, and the role it played in what later occurred cannot be underestimated.

Ernst Hanfstaengl recognizes this more clearly than most, writing:

> We all knew, but overlooked the deeper implications of the fact, that the first flowering of his personality had been as a soldier.
> When he talked of National-Socialism what he really meant was military-Socialism, Socialism within a framework of military discipline or, in civilian terms, police-Socialism. At what point along the line his mind took the final shape it did I do not know, but the germ was always there.

When Hitler joined the German Workers' Party it was hardly a party at all. Its first public meetings in 1919, with Drexler speaking, were attended by audiences of ten, thirty-eight, and forty-one respectively. With Hitler speaking these numbers improved dramatically. In 1920 he spoke at more than thirty public meetings, drawing audiences of between 800 and 2,500 in every instance, Kershaw reports, party membership figures increasing similarly, from 190 in January 1920 to 2,000 a year later, and 3,300 six months after that. Hitler was being noticed, at first by other party members, subsequently by Munich's general public. Those who saw him speak at those first meetings had need of him and took care of him accordingly, which was a further boost to his confidence, extending his radius, bringing him into contact with new people in new contexts. An early member of the party, Dietrich Eckart, was especially important in this respect. Eckart was a poet, translator of Ibsen, a morphine-addicted anti-Semite who quickly took an interest in Hitler and became a mentor to him. He was twenty years Hitler's senior, as educated as he was cultivated, though often blunt in manner. He gave Hitler his first trip in an airplane, took him to the theater, bought him a coat, taught him writing, published his first articles, introduced him to circles he had not previously had access to, and generally paved his way into Munich's right-wing radical environment, as well as nourishing his anti-Semitic and anticommunist opinions and providing him with arguments in their support. "This man is the future of Germany," he would say of Hitler, according to Timothy W. Ryback. "One day the whole world will be talking about him." Eckart became a father figure to Hitler, who was flattered by his attentions and absorbed everything he taught him. Three years before Eckart was introduced to Hitler, he had found cause to proclaim:

> We need someone to lead us who is used to the sound of a machine gun. Someone who can scare the shit out of people. I don't need an officer. The common people have lost all respect for them. The best would be a worker who knows how to talk. He doesn't need to know much. Politics is the stupidest profession on earth. Any farmer's wife knows as much as any political leader. Give me a vain monkey who can give the Reds their due and won't run away as soon as someone swings a chair leg at him. I would take him any day over a dozen educated professors who wet their pants and sit there trembling with their facts. He has to be a bachelor, then we'll get the women.

Few could fit that description better then Hitler. When Hanfstaengl, born in 1887 and two years older than Hitler, met him, Hitler was thirty-four. For the first time in his life he was succeeding at something, for the first time in his life he was of worth to others and not just himself, but the portrait Hanfstaengl paints could quite as easily have been the young man Kubizek describes from his time in Linz and Vienna. After that first evening in the beer hall, Hanfstaengl attends another meeting and hears him speak a second time, and on this occasion his impression of Hitler is moderated somewhat, Hitler going further this time, with thinly veiled incitements to guerrilla warfare in the case of a French incursion on the Rhine, this sounding to Hanfstaengl like the language of a desperado. He finds Hitler's views on foreign politics alarming, disproportionate and extravagant. Yet he remains both captivated and intrigued, asking himself what might be at the back of this curious man's brain, and on attending a third meeting at which Hitler speaks he introduces him to his wife and to the wife of the Norwegian illustrator Olaf Gulbransson, and invites him to his home. Before long, Hanfstaengl is drawn into Hitler's inner circles, Hanfstaengl's wide network of contacts being of particular use to them. He pays for a new printing press for their weekly newspaper, facilitates the publishing of some articles on foreign affairs, and endeavors in his own words to influence

Hitler's views on foreign politics, which he finds too continental and narrow-minded, and overly determined by Rosenberg and his associates, whom he despises and whose anti-Semitism and anti-Bolshevism positively disgust him. Hitler listens attentively to what he has to say, Hanfstaengl writes, though would later become more indifferent; when it came to the United States, Hitler wanted to hear about skyscrapers and was more fascinated by details of technical progress than by political matters, though he was particularly interested in the Ku Klux Klan, which he thought to be a political movement much like his own, and in Henry Ford, not so much as an automobile manufacturer and industrial innovator but more as an anti-Semite.

In Hanfstaengl's home Hitler made a good impression, being especially taken with his wife, sending her flowers, kissing her hand, giving her adoring looks, and he played with the couple's son with the kind of spontaneity a child likes in an adult. His ill-fitting suit, his respectful diffidence and adherence to formal manners of address were all revealing of his class background, Hanfstaengl writes; Hitler spoke the way people of lower rank spoke to people of better education, title, or academic attainment. His table manners were good, though his tastes were occasionally curious; Hanfstaengl states that he had the most incredible sweet tooth of any man he had ever met. At one meal Hanfstaengl treats him to "a bottle of Prince Metternich's best Gewürztraminer" and coming back into the room after being called out to the telephone catches Hitler spooning sugar into his glass.

Hanfstaengl visits Hitler in his tiny flat at Thierschstrasse 41, where he lives extremely modestly, "like a down-at-heels clerk." His lodgings here comprised a single room with a large bed, too wide for its corner and with the head obscuring the single narrow window. The floor covering was cheap, worn linoleum, with a couple of threadbare rugs, on the wall opposite the bed was a makeshift bookshelf, the only other piece of furniture in the room apart from a chair and a table. The landlady, a Frau Reichert, was Jewish and found Hitler an ideal tenant.

> He is such a nice man, but he has the most extraordinary moods. Sometimes weeks go by when he seems to be sulking and does not say a word to us. He looks through us as if we were not there. He always pays his rent punctually in advance, but he is a real Bohemian type.

In the hallway there was an upright piano, and on one occasion when Hitler was due in court as a witness he asked Hanfstaengl to play something to calm his nerves. Hanfstaengl obliged with some Bach, to which Hitler sat nodding his head with vague interest. But when Hanfstaengl moved on to the prelude of Wagner's Meistersinger, Hitler switched on immediately:

> This was it. This was Hitler's meat. He knew the thing absolutely by heart and could whistle every note of it in a curious penetrating vibrato, but completely in tune. He started to march up and down the hall, waving his arms as if he was conducting an orchestra. He really had an excellent feel for the spirit of music, certainly as good as many a conductor. This music affected him physically, and by the time I had crashed through the finale he was in splendid spirits, all his worries gone, and raring to get to grips with the public prosecutor.

Kershaw describes the same occasion, and since this was a meeting that took place between Hanfstaengl and Hitler alone, there are no other sources than Hanfstaengl's memoir. Kershaw's account is as follows:

> Hitler was taken by Putzi's skills as a pianist, especially his ability to play Wagner. He would accompany Putzi by whistling the tune, marching up and down swinging his arms like the conductor of an orchestra, relaxing visibly in the process.

In the passages where Hanfstaengl is the source he is consistently referred to by the diminutive "Putzi," and Hitler's interest in Wagner comes across as comical and bizarre, as if only Hitler could find something so absurd to be relaxing. But Hanfstaengl does not portray Hitler as foolish, on the contrary he emphasizes his knowledge and his feel for the spirit of the music. The fact that he is able to whistle entire Wagner symphonies may indeed appear unusual, but the same was true of Wittgenstein, who could whistle Wagner to perfection and would often exploit his talent as a party trick to entertain his guests. It is hard to imagine the author of a Wittgenstein biography belittling the great philsopher's passion for music, even if it did manifest itself peculiarly in the form of whistling, but when it comes to Hitler the way Kershaw portrays him, everything he does is either sinister or ridiculous. Another example, Hanfstaengl writing:

> Hitler's intimates were nearly all modest people. As I got to know him I started attending the Monday evening Stammtisch at the Café Neumaier, an old-fashioned coffeehouse on the corner of the Petersplatz and the Viktualien Markt. The long, irregular room, with built-in benches and paneled walls, had space for a hundred people or so. Here he was in the habit of meeting his oldest adherents, many of them middle-aged married couples, who came to have their frugal supper, part of which they brought with them. Hitler would speak en famille and try out the technique and effect of his newest ideas.

And Kershaw's version:

> Certainly by the time Putzi Hanfstaengl, the cultured part-American who became his Foreign Press Chief, came to know him, late in 1922, Hitler had a table booked every Monday evening at the old-fashioned Café Neumaier on the edge of the Viktualienmarkt . . . In the long room, with its rows of benches and tables, often occupied by elderly couples, Hitler's entourage would discuss politics, or listen to his monologues on art and architecture, while eating the snacks they had brought with them, and drinking their liters of beer or cups of coffee.

Hitler's audience, his oldest adherents, middle-aged married couples of modest background, are in Kershaw's rendering "elderly couples" who "often occupied" the benches and tables, so not only does he alter their age, he also gives the impression they were simply customers there and Hitler knew them as no more than that. Why? Middle-aged couples of modest background gathered around Hitler in a cozy café lends an air of respectability and decency to Hitler that goes against Kershaw's image of him. This is why Kershaw's version also departs from "frugal supper" in favor of "snacks" and "liters of beer." The source text has no mention of beer or snacks, this is something Kershaw has added, presumably to enhance the impression of the place as a drinking joint, though certainly beer would also have been served there, and in the context of the juxtaposition the "cups of coffee" seem equally negative.

Hanfstaengl goes on to describe Hitler's inner circle at this time, all of whom are present at these Monday evening political and social meetings.

While Hanfstaengl perhaps might not be the most reliable source, having been close to Hitler for some ten years, for which reason he might well be considered a Nazi, with all that this entails as regards the need to explain things away, his memoir nonetheless does provide a balanced portrait of Hitler and his supporters, simply by not tending to any one side. It is this balanced nature of Hanfstaengl's account that makes it credible, and also what makes it interesting, in the picture it paints of Hitler and in its contribution to our understanding of his appeal, which cannot have been the appeal of a criminal, a clown, or someone of shallow nature, but must surely have been of a wholly different character, for how else would he be able to lead an entire nation with him into the abyss? He was human, the people around him were human, his party comrades were human. This is not the same as to say they were good, for the bad and the brutal too are human. Christian Weber, a burly horse dealer who enjoyed knocking communists about, has another side to him too. Hanfstaengl writes that Weber is flattered to be invited into the home of a person of the upper classes. How much this says of his sense of class belonging. All he really wants is a secure job and a measure of dignity in his life. And Hanfstaengl writes that Weber, this thug, possesses "an oddly intuitive sense of the bottomless pit of Hitler's mind" and realizes fully what Hitler is capable of – this is perceptible, at least to someone who knows, perhaps from himself, what humans are capable of and how that potential finds expression. Another who senses this is Eckart, Hitler's mentor, who "was already beginning to regret it." Why? And Drexler, the union man, who strongly disapproves of the violence that is becoming a growing factor in the party's activities. Those who accompany Hitler home from these Monday-night meetings are armed, Hitler himself carries a pistol in his jacket pocket, even when speaking. These evenings are strange in the way they bring together decent folk from meager backgrounds and raging fanatics, one of whom is perhaps mixed up in the most significant political murder to have taken place in the Weimar Republic, the assassination of the foreign minister, Rathenau. Hitler is the radial point of the group. He can whistle entire symphonies while air-conducting, he lacks the courage to approach a woman of his own age, he loves cakes and anything sweet, he holds the Iron Cross First Class, for bravery in combat, he lives a shadowy Bohemian existence in a shabby apartment, never keeps an appointment, is often seen in the showrooms of automobile dealers, and when in the company of others talks incessantly. He cannot tolerate anyone other than himself dominating any situation in which he is present, and in such instances will readily lie in order to regain others' attention, he always knows better, wears carpet slippers indoors, and has a nice line in impersonations, his take on Göring's wife and her Swedish accent being particularly funny, though he can do equally good ones of Max Amann in a rage and Quirin Diesl insulting a political opponent, his star turn however being the semiprofessorial, politically aware nationalist babbling on about Siegfried's sword and the German eagle in insufferably pompous fashion, Hanfstaengl writes, adding that Hitler had learned off by heart the greater part of a dreadful poem written to him by an admirer, containing endless half-rhymes on Hitler, which he recited with such passion he would have his audience in tears of laughter. Moreover he registers as a "writer" when checking into hotels, he has no eye for nature, never reads novels, admires Cromwell but most of all Frederick the Great; he is attracted by death, idealizes war, writes poems about his mother, hates the Jews and all things Jewish, he is interested in eugenics and reads everything there is about the biology of race, has never read Nietzsche, though he holds his prose to be the most splendid German, has in fact read Fichte and Schopenhauer, and his favorite motif in painting is Leda and the

Swan. This man it is who sits at the Café Neumaier every Monday night, surrounded by party comrades and supporters, with a pistol in his pocket and a militarized group of young men watching out for him who beat up communists and other opponents. He has written a letter in which he states that the Jews should be removed, and he has spoken out against them in all his numerous speeches. It is an opinion he shares with many, most prevalent among the lower classes, those higher up, where power normally resides, find it inappropriate and vulgar, a breach of a norm that is primarily aesthetic or founded on notions of class. Thomas Mann, who is in the same city, perhaps only a few streets away from the Café Neumaier, does not hate the Jews, such a notion would be unthinkable to him. He hailed the outbreak of the war, its blood stood for the authentic and significant, in contrast to the inauthenticity and insignificance of civilization, this too an extreme standpoint in our time, yet within the bounds of the acceptable not least because he took it all back after the war. But Hitler and Mann in the same city, at the same time. Is Hitler more evil than Mann? When neither has yet done wrong? What is evil? Anti-Semitism? What made Mann recoil from anti-Semitism while Hitler embraced it? Education? Is anti-Semitism a class issue? Or is it a question of personal decency, a qualitative difference between people who are unlike each other? Nazism plainly came from the bottom, Drexler was a blacksmith and a trade unionist, Weber was a horse dealer, most of the others were lower middle class like Hitler himself, functionaries and office workers, all in one sense or another having failed or been marginalized in some way. The exception is Eckart, but he is a deviant, not many poets were morphine addicts and Jew-haters, whereas figures such as Rosenberg and later Himmler and Goebbels are fanatics. The sympathizers, those middle-aged couples, also belonged to the working class and the lower middle class and were of slender means, those who suffered most from the crisis that had struck Germany. They took their frugal suppers with them to the restaurant from home. Such are the people closest to Hitler in 1922, before he took a step up and became a name throughout the land. But the simple fact of Truman Smith being dispatched to meet him, and Hanfstaengl joining his inner circle, indicates that the movement had started. Every premise of what would later occur is in place here. In Hitler, who has shown himself to be a brilliant orator, but who must also, on the basis of what Hanfstaengl writes, have revealed frightening sides of himself; in Drexler, who wanted decency, and in Hanfstaengl, who wanted the return of a strong and stable German Reich, and in Rosenberg, who with his Estonian background despised Russia, and whose east-European anti-Semitism, according to Sebastian Haffner, surpassed that of the west in its brutal and violent expression, and in the anonymous middle-aged couples of the lower middle class. Of this conglomeration, Toland writes:

> Such were the men close to Hitler. His movement cut across all social classes and so all types were drawn to him – the intellectual, the street fighter, the fanatic, the idealist, the hooligan, the condottiere, the principled and the unprincipled, laborers and noblemen. There were gentle souls and the ruthless, rascals and men of good will; writers, painters, day laborers, storekeepers, dentists, students, soldiers, and priests. His appeal was broad and he was broad-minded enough to accept a drug addict like Eckart or a homosexual like Captain Röhm.

Hitler never underrated a follower, Toland writes, no matter how humble, no matter how wretched he or she might be, he opened up the new party offices to down-at-heel and unemployed followers and party members who needed refuge from the cold. At the same time he looked upward, seeking out wealthy industrialists sympathetic to his cause to drum up financial support, and through Hanfstaengl he was introduced into upper-class society. Hanfstaengl introduced Hitler to William Bayard Hale, a classmate of President Wilson at Princeton and chief correspondent in Europe for the Hearst newspapers, to the artist Wilhelm Funk, whose salons were frequented by Prince Henckel-Donnersmarck and a variety of wealthy, nationalistically inclined business figures, Hanfstaengl reports, never concealing his own attraction to nobility and fame; he takes Hitler with him to visit Fritz-August von Kaulbach's family, patrons of the arts, Hanfstaengl hoping they would connect in that common interest and that Hitler would be influenced by their refinement; he takes him with him to visit the Bruckmann family, who run a large publishing house in Munich and published Houston Stewart Chamberlain, the well-known anti-Semite. Elsa Bruckmann, formerly Princess Cantacuzène, would take Hitler under her wing as a protégé, but when later she extends her patronage to Rosenberg, Hanfstaengl makes a point of no longer attending her salon, finding it unworthy that a woman from "a family which had entertained Nietzsche, Rainer Maria Rilke, and Spengler" should be taken in by such a charlatan.

There is something naïve and wide-eyed about Hitler in these contexts, he writes, particularly after a dinner given by the Bechstein family, the famous piano makers, where Hitler in his usual ill-fitting blue suit feels embarrassed in such splendidly elegant company. Frau Bechstein convinces him to acquire a dinner jacket and a pair of patent leather shoes, which he does, though apart from the shoes, which for a period barely leave his feet, he hardly ever wears the outfit, an appalled Hanfstaengl warning him that no leader of a workers' movement should be seen going around in the garb of the upper classes.

Both Frau Bechstein and Frau Bruckmann show maternal concern for Hitler, and Hanfstaengl mentions other such women in Hitler's life, much the same age as his mother would have been, to whom he is obviously drawn, presumably because they are maternal and caring and because sexually they represent no threat to him. He knows no other women, is uninvolved in any relationship, and, Hanfstaengl writes, has no sex life. He is taken with beautiful women, and develops an infatuation for some, Hanfstaengl's wife among them, but always platonically and without commitment.

> One thing that became borne in on me very early was the absence of a vital factor in Hitler's existence. He had no normal sex life. I have said that he developed an infatuation for my wife, which expressed itself in flowers and hand-kissings and an adoring look in his eyes. She was probably the first good-looking woman of good family he had ever met, but somehow one never felt with him that the attraction was physical. It was part of his extraordinary gift for self- > dramatization, part of hidden complexes and a constitutional insufficiency which may have been congenital and may have resulted from a syphilitic infection during his youth in Vienna.

> At this early period the details were unknown to me and one could only sense that something was wrong. Here was this man with a volcanic store of nervous energy, with no apparent outlet except his almost medium-like perfomances on a speaker's platform. Most of his women friends and acquaintances were the mother-type, Frau Bruckmann and Frau Bechstein. There was another woman in her sixties I met, named Carola Hoffmann, who was a retired schoolteacher and had a little house in the Munich suburb of Solln, which he and his cronies used to use as a sort of sub-headquarters, where the good lady mothered Hitler and fed him with cakes.

His rage, not without lust, when he took Kubizek into the red-light district in Vienna, seemingly as terrifying as it was enticing; his total rejection of brothel visits and French women in the trenches, his sustained, remote infatuation with Stefanie in Linz, whom he never found the courage to approach, his tirades against the declining sexual morals of the day, his abstention from masturbation, his horror of germs and infection, his physical and moral meticulousness, not to say prudery. On the bottom shelf of the bookcase in his apartment he kept a small collection of semipornographic books, Hanfstaengl writes, and this is the essence, woman as pure, woman as image, an object he can admire and dream about as long as he can do so from a distance, but which poses an immediate and alarming threat as soon as it comes close to breaking into his world in the form of some physical reality. His fear of intimacy is immense, and with it his fear of sex; it is the bodily, physical nature of it he cannot stand, and the nearness of another. Woman as it, alluring and delightful in dreams, but never as you, in his intimate sphere. The few women he became involved with had in common that they were all much younger than him, barely of age. One such was Maria Reiter, whom he met along with her sister in 1926, just after the publication of Mein Kampf, she was very young and they met in a park where they were all walking their dogs. They chatted for an hour, Hitler invited them to attend one of his speeches, a closed event, glancing often at Maria as he spoke, accompanying her home afterwards, placing his hands on her shoulders, about to draw her toward him when suddenly in a fit of rage he felt compelled to thrash his misbehaving dog with the whip he was in the habit of carrying at the time. According to Liljegren they saw each other again on a number of occasions; Hitler asked her to call him Wolf, and he called her Mizzi. They visited her mother's grave, they went on picnics and for drives in the countryside. Hitler was thirty-seven, she was sixteen. Later she related that he had kissed her once. When her birthday came he gave her a yellow armband and the two volumes of Mein Kampf bound in red leather, with the inscription "Read these books and you will understand me." Her father, who was a social democrat, did not approve of his daughter being involved with the leader of the Nazis. In a letter to her, Hitler wrote:

> Even if fathers sometimes don't understand their children any longer because they have got older not only in years but in feelings, they mean only well for them. As happy as your love makes me, I ask you most ardently to listen to your father.

Less than a year later Hitler had started to lose interest in her, and when she discovered he had stayed the night in his Munich apartment without getting in touch she tried to hang herself with a clothesline, only to be saved by her brother-in-law, Liljegren writes. The relationship was by all accounts never consummated, nor was another discreet love affair a few years later with his niece Geli, who his sister Angela had been pregnant with at the time of his mother's funeral.

Geli was nineteen years old when she moved to Munich to study; at first she became involved with Hitler's driver, Emil Maurice, the couple going so far as to become engaged, which made Hitler furious. In a letter to Maurice, however, Geli writes that "we shall be able to meet and even be alone together, Uncle A has promised. He's a dear, as you know." Nevertheless, Maurice, who had been with Hitler as a minder and all-around gofer since 1921, was given the boot. Later, he would state that "Hitler loved her, but it was a strange kind of love to which he would never admit." Hitler himself would say, "There is nothing finer than to educate a young thing as one wants: a girl of eighteen or twenty is as malleable as wax." When Hitler moved into a larger apartment in 1929, Geli moved in with him. He hid her away, gave her what she wanted, unless it was freedom – if she was going out she would be escorted, and she enjoyed no social contact with anyone her own age, only Hitler's party comrades. After two years of living like this she committed suicide, Hitler was on his way to Bayreuth when she shot herself in her room with his pistol. The bullet went through her heart. Questioned by police, Hitler said the two had argued before he left, she wanted to go to Vienna and take up singing lessons, Hitler refused, but she had been calm and wished him a pleasant trip when he left. Hitler's housekeeper Anni Winter, however, claimed Geli had found a letter in Hitler's jacket pocket when they had been cleaning his room earlier in the day. The letter was from another young and innocent-looking girl he had started courting. She was eighteen years old, her name was Eva Braun, and she too would end up committing suicide.

When Hanfstaengl first met Hitler he was involved with no one; whether this means he was physically impotent, as Hanfstaengl suggests, is impossible to say, but there are many indications that he lacked interest in or was perhaps even afraid of sex. Hanfstaengl's wife called him sexless or asexual, which tells us something about the way he came across, his attentions were pantomimic and unphysical, a representation of courtship, a representation of desire, not desire itself, which was kept wholly under wraps, suppressed. There was something effeminate about Hitler too, as can be seen in the film reels of his speeches, his gesticulations are often delicate and womanly, the way he sweeps his hair to the side, his body thin and unmanly, his voice often ascending into the higher registers. At the same time he found his place in a supremely male environment and would adorn himself with masculine accessories, whip, pistol, Alsatian dog, military boots, uniforms, and this is hardly strange, since a masculine environment such as the army shuns intimacy, in favor of remoteness, is centered around action and the handling of situations, without hugging, touching, confiding, as such perfect for Hitler in that he thereby discovered he could be with others without being touched by them, physically or emotionally. His great sensitivity, to which he opened himself only in his boundless and unflagging fascination with Wagner, belonged also to his feminine side, as did his whole passion for art; much can be said of his painting watercolors during lulls at the front, but it was not the usual pastime of the hardened soldier in the trenches.

Hanfstaengl's wife puts her finger on what both of them find odd about Hitler, stating succinctly, "Putzi, I tell you he is a neuter." Hanfstaengl ruminates on the theme, noting how many homosexual men there are in Hitler's inner circle – three or four, of whom Röhm, who displayed "a normal" interest in women during the war, were not discovered to be homosexual until the late 1920s – and writing:

> But even if he [Röhm] was not yet an active pervert there were plenty of others around who were. Heines and one or two other patriotic organization leaders became notorious for their tastes in this direction. And when I thought of my earliest contact with a Nazi recruiting agent, it occurred to me that there were far too many men of this type around Hitler.
> Part of the curious half-light of his sexual makeup which was only slowly beginning to preoccupy me was that, to say the least, he had no apparent aversion to homosexuals.

The utterance is interesting on several counts, not least in revealing Hanfstaengl's own problems in respect to homosexuality, which was indeed prohibited by law when he wrote his book in the 1950s, but "active pervert" and "a lunatic fringe of sexual perverts," as he goes on, are wordings full of disgust and, by contrast, reveal Hitler's own lack of problems with the issue. What Hanfstaengl is reacting against is the very fact of Hitler failing to react as strongly as he. On the contrary, Hitler wants men without family in his ranks, considering them more likely to put their hearts into the struggle. Does this mean Hitler is a homosexual, or does it mean he is sexually indifferent? Hanfstaengl is right in his musings insofar as Hitler's apparent lack of aversion is striking, since normally he is so extremely petty bourgeois in his opinions, reacting hatefully against any deviation from the norm, opposing anything that goes beyond, apart, that is, from this supposedly abhorrent deviation, taken to be the very antithesis of the masculine ideal Hitler so flaunted. Presumably his stance on the matter was determined by the fact that it did not encroach on him personally in any way – his fear and loathing of other forms of transgressive behavior, particularly promiscuity, touched more obviously on his own emotional life, as witnessed by his linking together of the Jewish and the sexual in Mein Kampf, where he writes:

> With satanic joy in his face, the black-haired Jewish youth lurks in wait for the unsuspecting girl whom he defiles with his blood, thus stealing her from her people. With every means he tries to destroy the racial foundations of the people he has set out to subjugate.

While it is Hanfstaengl who removes himself from homosexuality and Hitler who accepts homosexuals in his ranks, this is reversed in the case of the Jewish issue, Hanfstaengl holding that anti-Semitism is untenably prejudiced and despicable, with Hitler the fanatical Jew-hater, though the congruence is far from unambiguous, Hanfstaengl's contempt for the most hard-core anti-Semites in the party stemming in part from their own unpleasantly "half-Jewish" appearance.

Hitler is an embodiment of conflict as he passes through the Munich streets in 1922 in his dark overcoat and hat, always with his Walther pistol in his pocket and his whip in hand, flanked by his Alsatian dog Prinz and his bodyguard Ulrich Graf, boiling with his hatred for the Jews, his fear of women, and his yearning for simplicity. In the latter he was not alone, it was in the air, as if the times had suddenly been overwhelmed by complexity and confusion and were reeling under the impact.

The crumbling of norms against which he reacts so strongly in his speeches and in Mein Kampf is of course not only going on out there, in the culture, but also inside him. There is an abyss between his inner emotional life and his outer behavior, and the rational explanations he gives as to his opinions and actions are clearly squeezed by other, baseless, yet by no means unfelt motives.

The great theme of the Weimar Republic, alienation, was illuminated and described from all angles, from the right and from the left, and the notion of life as a struggle was by no means confined to Hitler. Walther Rathenau, the Jewish Social Democrat minister of the Weimar government assassinated by right-wing extremists in 1922, wrote in 1912 of humanity that it > builds houses, palaces, and towns; it builds factories and storehouses. It builds highways, bridges, railways, tramlines, ships, and canals: water, gas and electricity works, telegraph lines, high voltage power lines, and cables; machines and furnaces . . .

> What then is the purpose of these unheard-of constructions. In large part, they directly serve production. In part, they serve transport and trade, and thus indirectly production. In part, they serve administration, domicile and health care, and thus predominantly production. In part, they serve science, art, technology, education, recreation, and thus indirectly . . . once again production.
> Labor is no longer an activity of life, no longer an accommodation of the body and the soul to the forces of nature, but a thoroughly alien activity for the purpose of life, an accommodation of the body and the soul to the mechanism . . .
> Labor is no longer solely a struggle with nature, it is a struggle with people. The struggle, however, is a struggle of private politics; the most risky business, practiced and nurtured less than two hundred years ago by a handful of statesmen, the art of divining others' interests and using them for one's own ends, to have an overview of global situations, to interpret the will of the times, to negotiate, to make alliances, to isolate and to strike: this art is today not only indispensable for the man of finance alone, but, in an appropriate measure, is indispensable to every shopkeeper. The mechanized profession educates one to become a politician.

Peter Sloterdijk cites Rathenau here in his book Critique of Cynical Reason. Rathenau's analysis allows man two options: either to be consumed by production, thereby becoming a part of it, on a par with its machines and conveyor belts, or to stand up for himself and his own individuality, albeit using the system's own economic and political means, which in that way are pulled down from the superordinate structure into the sphere of the individual. The connection between the local and the global established by the new world-embracing modes of production and trade is something by which we, a hundred years after Rathenau was writing, have learned to express ourselves, indeed our lives have become as such in the peculiar interplay of individuality and mass consumption in which we live. The issue of authenticity, so precarious and acute in the period from the turn of the last century until Germany's collapse in 1945, has been solved by way of a grand flanking maneuver, a textbook display of pragmatics made possible by the two wars themselves. Each and every one of us lives as though we were our own statesman at the center of the world, where all that we believe and think is accorded the greatest weight, quite regardless of the fact that everyone else believes and thinks exactly the same thing. Culture's unprecedented and extreme cultivation of the individual, which takes place in the most equalizing culture the world has ever known, is a response to the problems that first appeared toward the end of the nineteenth century, which at the time were likewise perceived to be new. We simply close our eyes to the possibility of there being any discrepancy between the widespread perception of the one's unique individuality and the striking sameness of the all. In the 1920s, the sameness of the all was a dystopia. Throughout culture the threat of the mass human found expression, mask-like faces and uniforms amid huge cogs of clattering machinery in a world from which all individuality had been erased.

Rathenau:

> The intellect, still shaking from the excitements of the day, insists on staying in motion, on experiencing a new contest of impressions, with the proviso that these impressions should be more burning and acidic than those that have been gone through . . . Entertainments of a sensational kind arise, hasty, banal, > pompous, fake, and poisoned. These joys border on despair . . . The devouring of kilometers by the automobile is a graphic image of the deformed way of viewing nature . . .

> But even in these insanities and over-stimulations there is something mechanical. The human, simultaneously supervisor of the machine and machine in the global mechanism, under growing tension and heating, has surrendered his or her quantum of energy to the flywheel of the world's activity.

The war that came two years after Rathenau wrote these words meant that the idea of the unique I came under further pressure, catastrophic to the individual self, since the medium through which it then might express itself, heroism, was closed off by the mechanization of weaponry; courage, ingenuity, cunning, resourcefulness, all were futile in the face of the machine gun or in the hail of shells: death was random, its forces unmanipulable, the heroic departure of the one became a mass slaughter. The war was a war of machines, and men were but one device among others. In 1932 Jünger described a society in which everyone was a worker, all subordinate to machines, in a world without borders, without individuality, only movement and dynamics, bodies and machines; life in the total state. In a strange, paradoxical way it is toward just such a world Hitler and his party are heading as their movement gains momentum in 1921 and 1922. Strange because it is this very de-individualisation Hitler fears in Marxism and capitalism, and which he believes has led to cultural decline and chaos in society. That he finds this decline so marked means there is no longer any concord between his feelings as to the way things should be and the way they are. In the case of such concord existing, inner morals give meaning to the external world so imperceptibly that one understands them to be natural, while external actions and events likewise giving meaning to the inner being. In the case of such concord being absent, it must be established and at almost any price, its absence representing a direct threat to our identity, which is to say the relationship between the I and the we.

Hitler is clearly a damaged individual, presumably by a process that began in his childhood and which because of some innate dynamic became reinforced in his youth and early adulthood, but that part of him that is damaged, which is the ability to approach and be close to another, the ability to empathize with another, which is to say to see the other in himself, himself in the other, has placed him outside himself, alienated him from his own emotional life, which is to say that an unbridgeable divide has opened up between his emotions and his understanding of his emotions, whereby he has been deposited outside the sphere of the social.

The damage was in the times, and many of those who suffered it became artists, for in art the divide could be bridged. Hitler tried but received no acknowledgment, was not strong enough or talented enough to overcome the resistance and would have spun away into the oblivion of the great social void had it not been for the fact that he at least in part overcame himself, firstly in the war, then in politics, where he was acknowledged from the outset and helped along, and where he fulfilled a need. When the emotions are so radically disjointed, when the inner being is a chaos, one looks for order, rules, boundaries. The order, the rules, and the boundaries Hitler knew were those he had grown up with in Linz, but that was a world he had hated ever since the age of sixteen, when he began to dress like a Bohemian artist, and it was a world too that was on its way out, whose morals and rigid structures were not applicable to what he saw and experienced in Vienna and Munich, which to a far greater extent were characterized by the new age and the massive social problems that had come with it. The confusion triggered by the radical nature of the new was especially vast in Hitler's case and could find no outlet, certainly not in the social sphere; he read and thought, striving to establish some other concordance between himself and the world he lived in, inflamed with resentment by the dereliction of morals he saw to be a fundamental expression of a societal form and an outlook on life that he despised. He forbade himself all manner of enjoyment, retreating into asceticism, descending into depression for long periods, emerging urgently again, manically active, living only in art, in his dreams, and in the ideal, until eventually finding himself in a place where he could be unburdened of all that he contained, that place being the army, the radical simplification of his life.

The organization he was a part of building up in Munich in the 1920s, with its storm troopers, uniforms and weapons, was an extension of the military, and the politics he put forward, with its starkly defined enemy and all its muscular aggression, was an extension of the war by other means. That his appeal should be so vast that he could draw many hundreds of thousands, indeed millions of people along with him seems unfathomable to us today; we read the arguments and the perils are plain to us, the idiocy, the sheer contempt for fellow human beings, yet it was not by arguments he won over the people, but by that very abyss that ran through his soul, or by what it generated within him, for what he thereby expressed, his inner chaos and his yearning for that chaos to stop, were curiously congruent with society's inner chaos and its yearning for that chaos to stop. His chaotic soul strove toward the boundaries by which it was constrained, his hometown morality and the order provided by the military, which is to say the petty bourgeois and the Prussian or Wilhelmian, both belonging to the past, which in the hardships of the Weimar years was where the majority, Hitler among them, turned. What made Hitler so different, however, was the flame he ignited in all who listened to him speak, his enormous ability to establish community, in which the entire register of his inner being, his reservoir of pent-up emotions and suppressed desire, could find an outlet and pervade his words with such intensity and conviction that people wanted to be there, in the hatred on the one side, the hope and utopia on the other, the gleaming, almost divine future that was theirs for the taking if only they would follow him and obey his words.

Hitler was the great simplifier, a mirror to his own yearning, but rather than merely paying lip service to that yearning in his political convictions he exploited it cynically as a rhetorical trope, even hitting out against sophistication and complexity in his speeches. On one occasion, on his way home from the Café Neumaier with Hanfstaengl one evening in 1922, he was almost apologetic about this:

> Herr Hanfstaengl, you must not feel disappointed if I limit myself in these evening talks to comparatively simple subjects. Political agitation must be > primitive. That is the trouble with all the other parties. They have become too professorial, too academic. The ordinary man in the street cannot follow and, sooner or later, falls a victim to the slap-bang methods of Communist propaganda.

Hanfstaengl saw his role in respect to Hitler as saving him from Rosenberg and the fanatical anti-Semites, providing him with a wider, more international perspective than the provincialism Hitler and his party comrades otherwise stood for. He believed Hitler's political radicalism and leanings toward brutality derived from lack of education and would be consumed once he was introduced into the higher circles of society, the barons of industry he brought him together with, whose conservatism was the same as Hanfstaengl's own, extending no further into the utopian than the society their parents and grandparents had inhabited. Hanfstaengl believed they could make use of Hitler to reach down into the depths of the people, thereby failing to understand that he was uncorrectable, a revolutionary utopian and a fanatical racist. That this latter trait, specifically his anti-Semitism, could be moderated along the way as he gained in power and influence was a frequent notion of Hanfstaengl's. Hitler listened to him and needed him, but did not care for the things he said. For instance, whenever he tried to impress on Hitler the importance of a future alliance between the United States and Germany or spoke insistently about other issues of foreign politics, Hitler would lead him back to Clausewitz, Moltke, and Kaiser Wilhelm. Prewar Europe was his frame of reference for foreign politics, and as such it was not a question of whether Germany with him in charge should go to war, but rather of when. This was his position as early as 1922. Everything that happened in Hitler's life following the first war was a repeat of what had happened and existed in his life before it, only on a much grander scale and in reality, and the only true aim, to which everything had to lead, was a new war, bringing the first to its rightful conclusion. That he could achieve such a feat from the starting point he had in 1918 is hard to believe. But the very fact that all the odds were stacked so heavily against him, that he was such an underdog, was an important factor, certainly in the final years before he rose to become chancellor, it being widely held across a number of political parties that what would be most damaging to Hitler would be to hand him genuine power, because then he would be politically dead in no time, being nothing more than a charlatan, a bluffer, a simple little man of the lower middle class. Indeed, it is strange. That he, of all people, so alienated from his own emotions, sensing them only as they washed through his organism, blinding or darkening his soul and all his being, should become sovereign over those of all Germany.

Hitler would spend between four and six hours writing a speech, which he would then condense into ten foolscap pages with no more than fifteen to twenty words on each. As the meeting approached, Liljegren writes, he would pace the floor as if rehearsing in his mind the various points of his argument. At intervals he would speak on the telephone with someone inside the venue itself, asking how many people had come, what kind of mood they were in, whether opposition could be expected. He would dish out instructions as to how the audience was to be handled while waiting for him. Half an hour after the meeting had started he would call for his coat, hat, and whip, and go out to the car, preceded by his bodyguard and driver. On the speaker's platform he would place his sheets of paper with their cues on a small table on his left, moving each to another table on his right when he had finished with it. His pistol was in his back pocket. After the speech, which normally lasted some two hours or more, the national anthem would be played. Hitler would salute right and left, leaving the venue while the music was at its height, and was generally back in the car again before the singing was over. If he was speaking outside Munich he would go directly to his hotel. There he would take a bath, change, rest on the sofa, perhaps with Hanfstaengl at the piano, his entourage in the room next door. He made no contact with anyone in his audience either before or after his speech. It was him and the all, and no one else.

Hans Frank, then a young law student, saw him speak in 1919:

> The first thing you felt was that there was a man who spoke honestly about what he felt and was not trying to put something across of which he himself was not absolutely convinced. He made things understandable even to the foggiest brain . . . and went to the core of things.

The Münchener Post reported one of his speeches in 1920, Toland writes, and was amused by his imitations of Jews:

> Adolf Hitler behaved like a comedian, and his speech was a vaudeville turn . . . One thing Hitler has, you must give him credit, he is the most cunning rabble-rouser in Munich practicing such mischief.

Kurt Ludecke saw him in 1922:

> Presently my critical faculty was swept away. Leaning from the tribune as if he were trying to impel his inner self into the consciousness of all these thousands, he was holding the masses, and me with them, under a hypnotic spell by the sheer force of his conviction . . . His appeal to German manhood was like a call to arms, the gospel he preached a sacred truth. He seemed another Luther . . . I experienced an exaltation that could be likened only to a religious conversion . . . I had found myself, my leader, and my cause . . . I had given him my soul.

What was it about Hitler's speaking that awakened such emotion? That he came across as honest and genuine was important here, a person at long last who presented the unvarnished truth, unlike other politicians. Hardship was plain, discontent rising, verging on despair. Hitler gave direction to that discontent. The shame of Versailles, the November Criminals, the worldwide Jewish-Marxist conspiracy, these were the three points around which Hitler gathered his rage, and in this he was clearly not alone, but his special gift was to draw forth that rage and hatred in his audiences in a way that seemed utterly unmanipulative but true and obvious in the same way as that which may not be said but which nonetheless is known appears true and obvious.

His charisma as a speaker lay very much in the sense he gave that here was a man who said things the way they were, and the trust he thereby gained from his audiences, who in expressing their enthusiasm for him were also expressing their enthusiasm for themselves, the unity he created this way, was an unprecedented force he discovered himself able, like a magician, to direct wherever he wanted. This was power. Not the formal kind that came with a job or position, constrained by laws and regulations, those in writing and those unspoken, but real power, revolutionary and above the notion of the law. This probably only dawned on him gradually, for as Sebastian Haffner writes, he seemed for a long time to be satisfied merely with being his party's speaker, whose job it was to mobilize the masses, and the idea that he could become his party's and even his country's uncontested leader – an idea with a long German prehistory – did not become manifest until Mein Kampf, and became real only after the subsequent relaunch of the party in 1925.

But just as important as saying things the way they were was the way he did so. The language he employed was that of his audiences. Hanfstaengl writes that without stooping to slang, except for special effect, Hitler caught the vocabulary of the day as it rose from the people around him. Outlining the problems of a housewife without money to buy food for the family at the Viktualienmarkt, for instance, he would use just the words and phrases she herself would have used to describe her difficulties if she had been able to formulate them.

In this ear for voice, register, and sociolect, that which rises from the people and which differs from generation to generation, lay Hitler's talent. In it his sensitivity came into its own, the fact that he could not only listen to the voices of his day, but also convey them to his audiences in ways that were finely tuned, addressing each audience according to its own nature, depending on whether they were students or workers. He excelled too in the art of improvisation, pausing for instance if someone shouted a comment, folding his arms across his chest and delivering a bitingly satirical response that would have his audience in stitches. Always he spoke from within, in the language of the inside, rather than from above, in the manner of other politicians and speakers.

About a quarter of his audiences were women, and this too he would exploit to his advantage; often there would be opponents ready to heckle and interject, and in his search for initial support he would turn to the women, directing attention toward their everyday problems and domestic difficulties, the very proximate realities they lived and experienced, thereby, according to Hanfstaengl, eliciting his first bravos, breaking the ice between him and his audience. But all this is rhetoric, what he says and the way he addresses his audience, his ability to tune in to the will of the we and to stand as its rightful voice was certainly immense, but not immense enough to account fully for his success, neither at that particular time, having already spoken to a crowd of 6,000 in 1920 at the Circus Krone, nor later, when entire stadiums were filled to the brim with people wanting to hear him speak. More important than what he said and the way he said it must surely have been the fact that it was he and no other. In other words, his own personal presence, his appeal, what we call charisma.

Charisma is one of the two great transcendental forces in the social world; beauty is the other. They are forces seldom talked about, since both issue from the individual, neither may be learned or acquired, and in a democracy, where everyone is meant to be considered equal and where all relationships are meant to be just, such properties cannot be accorded value, though all of us are aware of them and of how much they mean. Moreover we attach value in our human sphere to that which is made, produced, or formulated, not to what is merely there to begin with; in other words, what is made, produced, or formulated is important, and what is merely there to begin with is not. In a university lecture hall, male attention is centered not on the woman with the most compelling arguments, she who speaks engagingly and with insight about Adorno or de Beauvoir, but on the woman deemed to be the most beautiful, and so it is in every space in which men and women are gathered, on every street and square, in every restaurant and café, on every beach and in every apartment, in every ferry queue and train compartment; beauty eclipses everything, bedims all else, it is what we see first and what we consciously or unconsciously seek. Yet this phenomenon is shrouded in silence inasmuch as we refrain from acknowledging it as a factor in our social lives, driving it out instead by our social mechanisms of expulsion, calling it stupid, immature, or unsophisticated, perhaps even primitive, at the same time as we allow it to flourish in the commercial domain, where it quietly surrounds us whichever way we turn: beautiful people everywhere. Beautiful people on TV, beautiful people in magazines, beautiful people in films, beautiful people in the theater, in pop music, in advertising, indeed our entire public space is packed with beautiful faces and beautiful bodies yet, at the same time, we consider beauty to be superficial, unconveying of the authentic, which is the inner being. Beauty belongs to the body and the face, which are mask-like outer expressions of the I, and its immutable, inevitable nature, the fact of it being given rather than chosen, is what disqualifies it, since after Nazism we can no longer attach value to what is innately human, the Nazis' division of the human into categories of the innate being what eventually led them into the final catastrophe. Which is to say: we attach value to it but do so in silence. This is similar to the relationship between individuality and sameness: the two things are mutually exclusive, but only if the connection between them is made – and so we refrain from making the connection. It is as if we live in two different cultures existing parallel to each other. One is the culture of commerce, in which everything is superficial, face, outer beauty, uniformity, sameness, properties we understand to be inauthentic, shadow-values existing only for the purposes of our entertainment; the other is the culture of the social, consisting of unique individuals, inner beauty, changing properties, diversity, things we understand to be authentic, values we take to be true. The untrue world is a place to which we escape in dreams, the true world is where we live. The sense of the untrue world becoming increasingly dominant in our lives, to the extent almost of becoming the world we live in, is what brings about the forceful craving for reality that has begun to emerge in the culture around us. But what is reality, if not the body? And what is the body, if not biology? Here we are within the realm of the given, to which all yearning inclined in the Weimar era, becoming apparent for the first time in the period leading up to World War I, when the pressures exerted by the inauthentic, by the many new and increasingly mechanized expressions of civilization, were displaced in favor of the authentic, which is to say the innate, which in turn is to say the body, blood, grass, death.

Charisma, which resembles beauty in that it cannot be learned or acquired, no matter how much we might practice or train, transcends the simple dichotomy of the inner and outer I, as well as that of the biological and the cultural in the human sphere, and may possess such force as to occasionally cancel out all other categories, causing them to disintegrate completely.

The charismatic human is truly unique, an individual who cannot be replicated, not because of his or her skills in argumentation but because of his or her presence alone, making plain the nonuniqueness, the ordinariness, of all others. So what kind of a value is charisma? And why are we so attracted by it? If a charismatic woman had been sitting next to the one talking about Adorno and de Beauvoir, and the other one, the one who was strikingly beautiful, all attention would have been on her, and not only all male attention, but all female attention too. Charisma is an unusual property, and what it consists of is almost impossible to say, and yet we recognize it instantly the moment we see it. If I see it in a woman, I desire her. If I see it in a man, I desire him too, in a comparable though not identical way, since what a charismatic man awakens in me is a wish to be there, in his presence, and to subordinate myself to him. There is an element of tenderness and affection in these feelings, there being an element in the charismatic, not of weakness, weakness is not the word, but vulnerability perhaps. The wish to be near, tenderness, affection, subordination; these are strong, direct emotions. But I cannot submit to them, cannot allow myself to want to be in the presence of a man as if I were in love with him, and I certainly cannot subordinate myself to him. Therefore I keep my distance, but not without observing the effect he has on everyone else in his presence, and in that I am consumed by jealousy, sometimes to unreasonable degrees, because I want to be him. This inner tussle goes on, I suppose, in the presence of all charismatic individuals, whether it is acknowledged or not. The charismatic I is so strong as to pose a threat to all other I's in its presence, who must fight to keep themselves afloat, or else give in and become, well, what? A part of the stronger I's we? A disciple, a follower, a yes-man. The aura of the charismatic individual contains an element of disinterest, of detached ease, an independence verging on the sovereign and somehow discouraging; to be seen or even liked by the charismatic individual is to be bestowed with favor, a gift with no ulterior motive, hugely covetable. Indeed the charismatic individual is free of the bonds of the social world, standing in a certain sense outside its domain, and this sense of boundlessness is what lends such force to their presence: the charismatic person is unrivaled.

As with all other human properties, charisma occurs in different degrees; many possess some small amount, few an abundance, hardly anyone has nothing but. Jesus was an extraordinarily charismatic person, his presence was so overpowering it illuminates the Gospels, which were written a hundred years after his death, and has continued to dazzle through the centuries that have passed. He, and what happened to him, cannot fully be understood without taking this into consideration. People stopped what they were doing to follow him. Enormous crowds gathered to hear him speak. He could disperse an angry mob by his sheer presence. His favor is a blessing, his disfavor a punishment. He demands of his disciples that they leave their families and friends, their entire social spheres, to live with him. When his mother and brother come to see him he sends them away. He is angered by the most trivial matters, like when he curses the fig tree outside Jerusalem, causing it to wither, or when he storms into the temple courts and sends the money changers scattering in all directions. His inner darkness as he sits in the Garden of Gethsemane, the self-destructive urge he feels within him becoming ever stronger, weighing him down during the days of Easter in Jerusalem, where he does nothing to save himself but follows the path that has been mapped out for him until, maimed and mutilated, he expires on the cross. Perhaps he was the most charismatic person ever to live. Someone must have been. Certainly his charisma continues to shine through to us today, two thousand years after his death. And it is not theology that has kept it alive; on the contrary, for theology is anticharismatic by nature, being abstract.

Nothing in Hitler's life before he reached the age of thirty indicates that he possessed any such remarkable charisma. Quite the opposite, for the descriptions we have of him from this time, from the flophouse in Vienna and the front in Flanders, suggest he is an odd little man with a somewhat unpleasant air. Captain Karl Mayr saw him as a tired stray dog looking for a master. But this changed drastically from the moment he began speaking in public. From then on the descriptions seem almost to be of a different person altogether. Socially too he was transformed; Rosenberg, Hess, Streicher, and soon Goebbels, all were in awe of him and more than willing to subordinate themselves to him. Yet Hitler himself was unchanged, his character and personality remained the same throughout. It was as if it were the very crowds themselves that conjured forth in him what they found so appealing. Without the crowd he was a nobody, a lonely failure of a man with an unjustifiably high opinion of himself, but in front of the crowd, in its gaze, his loneliness turned to independence, and the unjustified became justified as if by some covenant: he gave the crowd what it wanted, his I, independent of the we, and the crowd in turn gave him what he wanted, its we, dependent on the I. They saw him, and were drawn toward him. That pull was also of an erotic nature, the tension between him and the crowd is plainly sexual, though not unambiguously so, for he stands there not in absolute masculinity, and without absolute strength, which would have been cold and autocratic and forbidding; no, he is feminine too, which is to say ambivalent, and it is in that unclarified space that the tension exists and interplay with the mass becomes possible. It feels personal to watch him.

So it is with charisma, it becomes instantly personal. Watching a charismatic performer like Elvis in footage that might be forty years old, the way he relates to us feels personal, not because of his charm, or his sex appeal, or his good looks, or his body language, but because of his charisma, his unique presence, for which we can feel a kind of solicitude, and from which we could allow almost any indiscretion if we happened to be in its proximity. But those feelings might be peculiar to me alone, and other people might react less emotionally to watching Elvis in a forty-year-old TV show, because I had exactly the same feelings in relation to my father, seeing the same synthesis of remoteness and vulnerability in him, his unapproachability being so immense given that we occupied the same modest living space in the house on Tybakken all those years ago. But yes, there was something almost awkward about him that in the midst of all his forceful severity, so dislocated from my own existence, seemed to be asking for solicitude. I suppose I wanted to accommodate him in that, so it occurs to me now, though I have no idea how I would have reacted if any such thing had ever happened. But either it is the case that the state of subservience in which I existed at that time, that happy subordination, has meant that these feelings well up in me all too easily whenever I encounter the disinterested, independent type of person who is quite inaccessible, but who also exudes the opposite and thereby instills in me some sort of hope of community, of favor and blessing, or else I'm simply trained to see it like that, and am especially aware of it.

The summer has come. Warm streets outside the apartment, green parks, lightly dressed people. All winter and spring I've been getting up at three and four o'clock in the morning to write so I'd be finished in time for summer. I've promised Linda this, that the summer will belong to the family. Last summer we booked a holiday in Corsica, but Linda was ill and we couldn't go. I've always wanted to go to Corsica, so we booked again in the spring. The plan was to go away as soon as the novel was done. Now it looks like it's not going to work. But the holiday is paid for and they're going without me, taking Linda's mother instead.

I'm listening to Midlake, The Courage of Others, I've listened to it every day for months, and the last time I drove out to the house and listened to it in the car, the mood of Kubizek's book spread through me like a memory, as if it all stemmed from my own life. In a way it does, the books I've read are as inseparable a part of my history as everything that's ever happened to me. Hitler's Mein Kampf is no exception. It's different from all the other books I've read. I'm not sure why, but it stands out. Kubizek's memoir, in which Hitler is the main character, does not. In that book Hitler is seen from the outside and is an ordinary young man, albeit extremely serious and unusually strong-willed.

When Hitler writes himself, appearing in his own right, the reconciling aspect of Kubizek's viewpoint is gone. There is a consistent pettiness throughout Mein Kampf, a complete lack of the grandeur we have come to expect of literature, philosophy, and art, where the deepest and sincerest, often hard-won insight is forgiveness for everyone, the recognition of the human in us all, the absolute equality of others with ourselves. There is no such universality in Hitler's book, in which everything gushes through his mind to be manipulated at his own convenience according to whatever emotions are awakened in him, and in which not a single face occurs, in the sense of any unique person, rather the mere representative of a type, a political standpoint or a public role, apart from his own. But if we lift our gaze, if we elevate ourselves to where the particular characteristics of others can no longer be differentiated, Mein Kampf is a book in two volumes published in 1924 and 1928 respectively, written by a man born into the lower middle class in a monarchy on the verge of dissolution due to major internal tensions of both ethnic and cultural nature as well as staggeringly huge social problems, where the old values, the slow-paced bourgeois world with all its little securities so vividly described by Zweig, stood in sharp contrast to the explosively increasing poverty among the lower classes, which the book's author, whose faith in others must have been small to start with, as is often the case with children who have been ill treated, and whose belief in meaning and justice in life must have been undermined by the deaths of first his brother, then his mother, not only saw with his own eyes but also came to experience himself. He cannot have felt that he owed anyone anything. Grace, forgiveness, understanding, sympathy cannot have been part of his repertoire. A generous person would have been able to express himself from there too, but the author of this particular book was not a generous person, he was embittered, vindictive, conceited, and, when eventually he had the chance, callous and without mercy. But even in that he fell short, unlike Homer's or Shakespeare's or Snorre's heroes, who can be callous and without mercy and still display greatness; in that too he was petty and grudging. But for this very reason Mein Kampf does still express something significant, for while it was written by a certain man of a certain character, it is also pervaded by the time in which that man lived, and the problems of that time, and the fact that he never raises himself above his own person and his own time, being so small-minded and unyielding that he fails even to see the possibilities, means that all that is base and bad about that time gushes through the book as it gushes through him. He is indeed the little man writing about the great age.

Mein Kampf received terrible reviews. It was totally destroyed wherever it was given attention. The Frankfurter Zeitung, under the headline END OF THE ROAD FOR HITLER, called it political suicide. One Berlin newspaper expressed doubts as to the author's mental stability, according to Ryback. And the Bayerische Vaterland dubbed the book Sein Krampf ("His Cramp"). Hitler's book was ridiculed in many circles. In his memoir Stefan Zweig writes that hardly anyone read it, and the few who did refused to take it seriously because it was so poorly written.

Hitler himself was proud of his book, handing out signed copies to all and sundry and sending a copy to his family in Austria, although he had not been in touch with them since well before the war. The terms of his prison sentence included a ban on public speaking that prevented him from engaging in political activities, and on his release he rented a cottage in the Alps and began work on a second volume, Mein Kampf II. Completed in the summer of 1926, the book was ignored by the newspapers and a year after publication it had sold only some seven hundred copies. But Hitler carried on writing. Following Mein Kampf, which had been put out by a small-scale local publishing house with only limited distribution, he contacted the publishers Elsa and Otto Bruckmann, presumably because the book he was now planning to write was not intended to be political but to deal with his time at the front, much in the style of Ernst Jünger's Storm of Steel, a book he admired. Jünger had sent him a copy with the inscription "To the national Führer Adolf Hitler," and the volume is full of Hitler's underlinings. Ryback, who saw it, writes that what Hitler was interested in, judging by his marginalia, were the emotional and spiritual aspects of the war rather than more descriptive passages detailing concrete events, though with two exceptions, both concerned with moments in which sensory impressions become so fierce as to make everything shimmer, all sound vanishing at once. In a letter to Jünger, Hitler wrote, "I have read all your writings. In them I have come to value one of the few powerful conveyors of the frontline experience." In August 1927, in a letter to her husband concerning Hitler, Elsa Bruckmann writes that "he is already reflecting on the form of his war book, and says it is becoming more vivid and alive in him." In December a date is fixed for publication the following spring. But Hitler never delivered the manuscript, and it was never found. Most probably it was burned in the spring of 1945 along with all the other private documents Hitler ordered his adjutant to collect and destroy. Ryback, however, unearthed a manuscript intended as a third volume of Mein Kampf, kept in a safe on premises belonging to the Eher Verlag in Munich and handed over to the Americans after the war by an employee. Unfinished and running to 324 pages, it was presumably written in the summer of 1928, when Hitler was thirty-three years old, as political events in Germany were gathering pace and he and his National Socialist party were moving in on the epicenter of power. While the first volume of Mein Kampf dealt with Hitler's life up to his joining the German Workers' Party, and the second concerned the party itself and its history, the unpublished third volume focuses according to Ryback on Germany's place in history. After 1928 Hitler seems to have given up writing completely, and his image of himself as a writer, which must still have been very much intact during the four years he spent producing two published books and two manuscripts, with ambitions in one of the latter of going beyond the political, was eclipsed by his political involvement, at the same time as he began to recognize his limitations in the field. Reportedly he once complained to his personal solicitor, Hans Frank, praising Mussolini for his splendid mastery of Italian in speech and writing, while regretting that he himself was incapable of matching him in German. "I just cannot keep my thoughts together when I am writing," he remarked, according to Ryback. And again to Frank, on another occasion: "If I had had any idea in 1924 that I would have become Reich Chancellor, I never would have written the book."

For a modern reader, and by that I mean someone reading it today, as I have, on May 4, 2011, society is in almost every conceivable respect far removed from that in which Mein Kampf was written, though not without occasional ties – as I write these words today the last surviving soldier from World War I has died. Claude Choules was his name, he fought on the side of the British and was 110 years old. It is three days since Osama bin Laden was killed in Pakistan by U.S. special forces, a man often compared to Hitler, as so often happens with important enemies of the West and Western values, but even if there are some similarities, in their irreconcilable hatred of international capitalism, in the victim mentality expressed by terrorism, where the cause is always greater than the individual, who not only gives up his life in its service but does so gladly, the differences are at the same time so vast that any comparison is irrelevant, be it in the case of Bin Laden or anyone else who wears and has worn the face of evil since Hitler's day, for instance Idi Amin, Papa Doc, Saddam Hussein. We are used to it always being the others, always the not-us, whereas Hitler was one of us, he pursued his will from within us, from our own European culture, and he did so as the leader of a community big enough not just to start a world war but to keep it going for five years, until twenty million human lives had been lost and the genocide of six million people had very nearly been completed, against which everything else simply pales. The most alien aspect of Hitler's writing is not the politics, for although such radical nationalism is anathema to us, it is not unrecognizable or impossible to relate to, rather it is the hatred of the Jews, set forth with such vigor it is hard to conceive, in the sense that to us today it seems unthinkable that someone could actually mean what Hitler writes about the Jews in Mein Kampf.

The other striking thing about Mein Kampf relates indirectly to the first and has to do with the often unpleasantly base style its author employs, normally absent from the writing of the day, which is to say the age of the Weimar Republic. Style is little more than self-awareness, not in the singular I, but in the I of the text, arising in assumptions about the receiver of the communicative act. These assumptions exist as a kind of horizon of expectation against which the I defines and molds itself. Style is to the written text as morality is to behavior, setting the boundaries of what may and must be said or done, and how. If I write the word "cunt," I am overstepping the boundaries set by normal style; if I do so fully cognizant of this it is because I am trying to achieve a certain stylistic effect, albeit not necessarily tastefully; as a provocation the word is devoid of meaning, mostly coming across as adolescent and almost impossible to use without it rubbing off adversely on the I of the text, unless of course it was being used as an example of a certain kind of language, to represent a character, to "say" something about that character. (After writing this, I added the word "cock," so that the sentence instead began "If I write the words 'cunt' and 'cock' . . ." and the reason I did this was because it struck me that "cunt" could arouse suspicions that I might be a misogynist, perhaps even afraid of women, having chosen that particular word, as if it were the most readily available, and in that way I might infelicitously be associated with Hitler – infelicitously because it might look like I was not aware of the fact, that I was blind to it, and around this point, my presumed misogyny and fear of women, a highly intricate web might then be spun out of whatever other indications might be discovered as to my lack of social intelligence, my sad and lonely life, and what I wrote about blood and grass, and all sorts of other things besides, could all be clustered around one single point of identification: Hitler. If such language occurs in a way that can be perceived as blind or unconscious, the entire credibility of the I may fall or be undermined, but if it occurs in a way that is clearly intended, and thereby calculated, it may in that case be perceived as heightening the relevance of the Hitler figure, perhaps even fleshing out the singular I of the text. Within that space, what the text knows and does not know about itself, tensions crackle always, though less so in texts in which the I is stylistically certain, precisely since it complies with all kinds of expectations the words create, having them under its control, knowing how to play on them, and that play, which takes place between reader and writer, two entities emerging in the very act of writing, becomes more invisible the more sophisticated the writer happens to be. That such play occurs is often impossible to discern before a certain time has elapsed, when what belongs to the age is no longer taken for granted, which is to say when the reader of the text is no longer a part of what the writer seeks to go toward. The writer's motion toward, which begins in the expectation of the I, does not find a way to implant itself in the reader, and the very gesture of proceeding toward meeting a reader in a text becomes plain. The epochal mood exuded more or less by all writing, which for instance makes all texts from the 1950s similar in style, is to do with this. When I typed the word "cunt" and intuitively realized it could be read in a certain way in respect to the text as a whole, which is to say that I "felt" a certain viewpoint, "sensed" a certain line of thought directed toward unrecognized or suppressed misogyny, I added the word "cock" in order that the two words together might be a better signal of the rather stupid transgression I was trying to illuminate, without the gender imbalance that could arouse suspicions [probably justifiably, though that would be another discussion], until I realized that it was the very process I was seeking to describe that was at work here, the considerations one makes when writing, the boundaries the very act of communicating establishes, which make up the morality of the text.) If I were to type "nigger" or "spade," the vast majority of cultured readers would turn away, such words being unacceptable, not because what they refer to, black people, cannot be named, but because they cannot be named in that way, with words so laden with contempt, used only by people who know no better because they grew up in parts of society that are largely uncultured in this sense, perhaps having been mistreated, now full of agression toward just about anyone and anything, which comes out in such expressions of the language, or else by people more cultured who know what they are doing, and who do so calculatedly, which is to say out of malice or spite, something which seldom occurs, no scientific paper would ever contain the word "golliwog" used in this way, no essay or newspaper article would contain the word "nigger," no novel the word "spade" in this sense, other than to provide a picture of people in uncultured, which is to say socially deprived, areas of society. If someone from such areas of society is to express themselves in public, they must learn to command the style that is prevalent there, and if they do, its implicit moral judgments come with it, meaning such thoughts and notions as prevail in the uncultured domain are invariably kept out and suppressed, not by some dedicated strategy but as a result of the mechanisms society always has at its disposal to control what is undesirable and make sure it never gets a chance to rise to the level at which political decisions are made.

The boundary between what may not be said and the ways in which it may not be said is so unclear that sometimes they look like two sides of the same coin.

Nearly all the literature of the Weimar years that is still read today, a striking number of classics coming out of Germany in the period 1919–33, is tasteful indeed, at the very highest cultural level in terms of style, and while to us the mind-set of that writing can be both outrageous and unacceptable, for instance Carl Schmitt's definition of politics as the business of distinguishing between friend and foe, the consequence of which has to be the physical elimination of the foe, or Walter Benjamin's notion of divine violence, we nonetheless accept that literature, studying it and discussing it in the same way as the unoutrageous, though taking care to state that such thinking is dangerous, that the texts in which it occurs are an exception, that they were produced in politically turbulent times. The mind-set is dangerous, but the style is exquisite, and for that reason we allow ourselves to handle them.

Hitler's Mein Kampf exhibits no style whatsoever, not even low style, its I simply gives vent to its opinions on a variety of different matters without at any time showing the slightest sign of being able to see itself; in other words it is uninhibited and excessive, seeking no legitimacy anywhere other than in its own self, which can say exactly what it wants because that is what it is, and because it knows no better. The I of Mein Kampf is self-congratulatory, self-centered, self-righteous, unrestrained, hateful, and small-minded, yet considers itself just and reasonable and grand, and it must have been this that resulted in such dismal reviews and meant that the book was never taken seriously, Hitler was showing his face without realizing it, revealing himself to be nothing more than an uncultivated, crude, and brutal man of the masses, who with his limited knowledge took a little here and a little there and stirred it about until ending up with something he thought was politics, but which was nothing more than a series of prejudices, anomalous opinions, and pseudo-scientific assertions. His strong anti-Semitism was another expression of the same thing. Anti-Semitism was widespread, although, as Hitler points out; in the quality newspapers and magazines it was nonexistent, they were above it, often to such an extent that they would refrain from addressing it, even though it was one of the major issues of the time. The newspapers and magazines in which it did find expression belonged to the lower levels of society, the vulgar and unrefined, and often, though not always, displayed contempt for all that was considered intellectual and high-cultural, not what belonged to the conservative middle class with its Wagner, but the culture of the growing avant-garde.

When the "Jewish question" was discussed at levels above these bubbling cauldrons of prejudice and stereotype, the language employed was without hatred and disgust, without visible emotion, but rational and investigative. In 1930, for example, toward the end of the Weimar period, the Süddeutsche Monatshefte devoted a special issue to "Die Judenfrage." The editors justified the move by stating that the matter was one of the most pervasive and complex issues since the war: "The diversity of explanations, interpretations, and attacks directed toward the Jewish person from without corresponds to what seems to the outsider to be a confusing diversity of ambition in Jewish society itself." The editors wanted as many voices as possible to be represented, Jewish as well as non-Jewish, Semitic as well as anti-Semitic. "We believe this to be the first time Jews and anti-Semites have collaborated in a single publication," they noted.

Ernst Jünger's contribution, Über Nationalismus und Judenfrage, concludes that the Jews in Germany were faced with the choice "either to be a Jew or not to be," Heidegren writes, by which he meant that the Jews needed to retain their particular Jewishness in order to remain Jewish, and that the values that lay in that particular identity were under fire from the equalizing mind-set of economic liberalism. Like Hitler, Jünger saw international capitalism and Marxism as posing a threat to Germanness, both were nationalists, but the crucial difference was that for Jünger this sense of the individual, rather than being restricted to what was German, also pertained to others, including the Jews. Jünger holds up this notion of particularity and differentiation, the qualities deemed peculiar to an area, a culture, a people, a nation, as a counterweight to sameness and undifferentiation, and in that respect the problem becomes more the assimilation of the Jewish into the German, comparable to the assimilation of the German into the international, rather than Jewishness in itself. But even in this brief, rational, and stylistically formal essay, as far removed from Hitler's prose as it is possible to get within the same culture, there are traces of anti-Semitism.

> In order to be able to become dangerous, infectious, corrosive, it was necessary for him to first have a status that enabled him to be in his new figure, the figure of the civilized Jew. That status was created by liberalism, by the grand declaration of the independence of the spirit, and it likewise will be destroyed again by nothing but the complete bankruptcy of liberalism.

That the Jew was "dangerous, infectious, corrosive" was by no means an outrageous claim in 1930, for such assertions were common. Jünger ties this to a shift in culture whereby Jewishness lets go of itself and becomes German as a consequence of liberalism rather than of anything inherent in Jewishness itself, its nature or essence, and this is the big difference between Jünger's utterance here and those of Hitler in Mein Kampf, yet it is impossible not to view them in the same context, for the elements are the same, Jewishness viewed as infectious and bound up with liberalism, and only that context – in which Jewishness was considered a problem, not only in the realm of the vulgar but also in that of the cultured, albeit far from universally so, and even among Jews themselves – for there were indeed anti-Semitic Jews – and Jewish identity, and what comprised it, was discussed without end throughout the interwar period – makes it possible to understand that a man such as Hitler, who had written such a book as Mein Kampf, in which anti-Semitism was the core from which everything radiated, could eventually end up chancellor of the Reich.

If we compare Hitler to one of the most important intellectuals of the same period, the Jewish philosopher Theodor Adorno, this aspect of Mein Kampf becomes clear, for what would Adorno have made of it? He would have been unable to challenge it with his rational, finely tuned, unimaginably precise and subtle arguments, for there is nothing there to challenge, Adorno is at a level so far above Mein Kampf that he would not have been able to take it seriously, to consider it worthy of his attention. Had he done so, he would have elevated it to something it was not, lending it legitimacy by his very interest. He could have ridiculed it, as it was ridiculed elsewhere, but doing so would not have served any purpose; the only sensible strategy would be to pay it no heed. Mein Kampf was too base to be made the object of rational discussion, and as such could simply be rejected without argument.

Had Hitler not been self-taught, had he, say, studied philosophy during his time in Vienna and formulated the ideas put forward in Mein Kampf within that horizon, it would have been fair to discuss it, analyze it, dissect it, but that would not have been possible unless it had vented something other than was the case, the main thing about the book being that it has no such horizon, that its I does not direct itself toward any singular you, only toward a we, and stands furthermore outside that we. It is in the singular you that the obligation exists, and it is that obligation, which comprises a community, that makes a discussion possible. Hitler's I lacks a you, is unbound by any obligation, and so ultimately is immoral, or devoid of morality in any sense. Jünger's I possesses a you, meaning it can be argued against, for example by saying that the word "infectious" not only denotes something that spreads between humans, but also has strong connotations with sickness and disease, something pathological, and that the connection between liberalism and Judaism is too weak for the pathological aspect of the argument not to cling to the particularly Jewish, or to the Jew, who precisely in this way is construed as corrosive and dangerous, or disposed to be so, and in other words to be qualitatively apart from you and I, who are non-Jews, and surely you cannot claim this to be the case? But indeed I can, he would then be able to counter, or no, that's not what I mean at all, but whatever he might say, the text and the opinions it makes manifest would be amenable to discussion, and Jünger and those who agreed with him would, in principle, be able to accept the counterargument and change their opinion accordingly, or adjust their arguments so as to reduce the risk of misunderstanding. In that process, which should not only be taken literally but also figuratively in terms of the conscious or unconscious reflection any text invites, between the singular I and its you, the boundary is set for what is possible and what is not possible to say in any day and age; this is where contemporariness exists, and crossing that boundary, which is also the boundary of obligation and morality, is only possible by transcending the you of the I, which presupposes that it is weak or nonexistent. Jünger did not, his assertion was good seen from the perspective to what was acceptable in society at the time, and yet it was dubious. But dubious in respect for what? The law? The courts? Public to opinion? Societal norms?

An utterance being anti-Semitic cannot be relative, but the way we understand the anti-Semitic may indeed be relative. We explain Jünger's utterance in terms of him being a right-wing nationalist, a glorifier of war, and a person held in esteem by Hitler, without that necessarily meaning he was a Nazi himself, and yet there is a connection, and on the basis of that contextualization we think to ourselves that he was indeed morally dubious, and consider his utterance about Jewishness in that light. But how are we to understand another person of the same generation, one of the twentieth century's most significant literary figures, Franz Kafka, a Jew, writing disparagingly about the Jews? In a diary entry from August 6, 1914, he writes:

> Patriotic parade. Speech by the mayor. Disappears, then reappears, and a shout in German: "Long live our beloved monarch, hurrah!" I stand there with my malignant look. These parades are one of the most disgusting accompaniments of the war. Originated by Jewish businessmen, who are Germans one day, Czech the next; admit this to themselves, this is true, but were never permitted to shout it out so loudly as they do now. Naturally they carry many others with them. It was well organized. It is supposed to be repeated every evening, twice tomorrow and Sunday.

The utterance is by no means anti-Semitic, but "Jewish businessmen" is nevertheless associated with "malignant" and "disgusting," and their identity construed as something they choose according to whatever is most advantageous, and this, that Jews are businessmen ready to abandon almost anything for personal gain, even their identity as Jews, is a standard trope of anti-Semitism, and even though Kafka does not state that it is a property of all Jews, but only these particular Jewish businessmen, his utterance might certainly have been used as evidence to that effect if it had been presented as something the likes of Jünger or Hamsun had written. If it had occurred in a book by Jünger or Hamsun, we would have deemed it inappropriate but, if we held those authors in sufficiently high esteem, perhaps explained it as being a mere expression of political naïvety in confusing times, whereas if we had not held them in esteem we would have taken it to be another indication that they were bad and immoral individuals, yet coming from Kafka's pen we construe it quite differently. This suggests that the morality of an utterance is not absolute, but is determined also by its style and its signature, and may change as its framework of interpretation, which is to say culture, changes. Mein Kampf did not mean the same in 1924 as it did in 1934, and it did not mean the same in 1934 as it does today. Both Kafka's and Jünger's utterances were fully acceptable in their day, they were by no means outrageous, whereas Hitler's utterances in Mein Kampf were definitely so. They were not forbidden, and were not even controversial, in the sense of causing scandal, they were merely vulgar, simple, tasteless, and malicious.

The story of Mein Kampf is the story of how, from being something to dissociate oneself from in 1925, it becomes transformed into something to espouse in real life in 1933. Hitler himself did not change, he held the same opinions in 1925 as he did in 1933 and 1943, but the people around him changed, and that change is perhaps the most significant thing of all about the Nazi movement in Germany, that what was previously wrong with the movement became right, what was previously immoral became moral, and that this did not occur by any change in legislation or any other instrument at the disposal of the formal institutions of society, but by a change in the very community, which is to say in the social world, the societal we, whose expression in the individual is called conscience.

If Hitler's I is lacking the singular you, both in life and in literature, this does not mean that he lives or writes in a vacuum, only that what he does, thinks, says, and writes is unconstrained by obligation to anyone else but himself and what he believes to be right. He does so within a system where "the other" exists only as "the others," either in the great we, the community of nation, the Germans, or in the great they, the enemies of the nation, the Jews. Inside this system, ideas and notions circulate, lifted from various aspects of life in society, put together in totally idiosyncratic, often idiotic ways, which is one thing that can happen when an individual is unamenable to correction, another being that moments of genius may occur, and what emerges from all this, in a text that pays no attention to what ought or ought not to be said, to what is decent and what is offensive, is the blind side of society, that part of it we try to avoid and which the power structures of style and taste keep hidden away in the dark. In 1910 it would have been unthinkable that a man who had written a book such as Mein Kampf could become a head of state.

Heads of state were either monarchs, as in Britain or Germany, the ministers they appointed coming from the upper reaches of society, from the finest families and the finest schools, cultivated individuals held in the highest esteem for this very reason, or else they were presidents, elected from the same elevated and culturally and economically affluent circles. This system was suppressive, keeping the lower classes in their place, but suppression is not unambiguously an ill as we are taught to think, the exercise of power is not the same as the abuse of power, which is to say that abuse of power can have other functions besides maintaining the privileges of a certain class. It excludes what is undesirable, and the undesirable is of course that which undermines the privileges of the ruling class, but also that which is destructive of the values and stability of the society the ruling class is entrusted with governing. Revolution overturns the structure of society, destroying the values on which it is built, and doing so by violence. Revolutionary violence may be construed as a reaction to the structural violence inherent within a societal system – the need, poverty, and gross injustice it generates – but is nonetheless unlawful, for revolutionary violence is also violence among like kind, which no society can tolerate, and the first thing that happens when revolutionaries seize power is that they set up new laws quite as inviolable as the old, with the same purpose, to control that violence within and ensure order and stability in society. This was what happened in France in 1789, in Russia in 1917, and in Germany in 1933, the difference being that the revolution in Germany was not simply a class revolution from below, but involved the lower, middle, and upper classes at once, though primarily the lower middle class, and set the law aside largely without bloodshed. This was possible because societal structures had already broken down or were in the process of breaking down. The state apparatus belonged to the old monarchy, parliamentary democracy was weak, and when inflation and unemployment rocketed with the Depression in a context of humiliation following the debacle of the war, democracy became a paradox, voting for its own dissolution, which is to say handing power to Hitler and the National Socialists, who were antidemocratic. What had existed only as a miscellany of phenomena and shifting currents at the bottom of society only ten years before was suddenly the ideology of a supreme governing party, no longer base and contemptible, but elevated and noble.

Hitler expressed what the average German thought but declined to say, and he did so compellingly and with such conviction as to make it legitimate, and the more people who followed him in that direction, realizing that what one thought in one's own mind yet was perhaps wary of expressing could indeed be expressed, the more legitimate it became. The opinions Hitler expressed were clear and unambiguous, he concealed nothing, and they could easily have been repudiated, he and his party having no power on their own, such power being granted by those who listened to them and who in doing so heard themselves, their own voice of reason, the voice that said this is the lay of the land. That nothing suppressed that voice, those hitherto quiet thoughts, and that the structures to reject such baseness had ceased to operate became Germany's tragedy.

This is the lay of the land, said Hitler, this is the lay of the land, said the people and cheered Hitler, and in doing so they cheered themselves and their own. Hitler gave self-righteousness a voice, we could say, but only if we are above that voice, only if our taste is superior, our judgment superior, only then is it the voice of self-righteousness. If one is a part of it, it is righteous. And who is to say where the boundary lies between righteous and self-righteous? Who is the arbiter of a society's morals, who decides what is acceptable and what is not? Not the one, but the all. Morality does not exist outside society, outside its institutions, in the form of something absolute that we humans may invoke at any time, no, it is a part of us at this very moment and moreover was different in the time of our parents, as it will be different in the time of our children, though perhaps not by much, for the most desirable thing for a society is for its moral structures to remain the same and to appear for as long as possible to be absolute and extrasocietal. This, however, is not feasible, as events in Germany after World War I made abundantly clear. The philosopher Hannah Arendt writes of this issue in her book Eichmann in Jerusalem:

> And just as the law in civilized countries assumes that the voice of conscience tells everybody "Thou shalt not kill," even though man's natural desires and inclinations may at times be murderous, so the law of Hitler's land demanded that the voice of conscience tell everybody "Thou shalt kill," although the organizers of the massacres knew full well that murder is against the normal desires and inclinations of most people. Evil in the Third Reich had lost the quality by which most people recognize it – the quality of temptation. Many Germans and many Nazis, probably an overwhelming majority of them, must have been tempted not to murder, not to rob, not to let their neighbors go off to their doom (for that the Jews were transported to their doom they knew, of course, even though many of them may not have known the gruesome details), and not to become accomplices in all these crimes by benefiting from them. But, God knows, they had learned to resist temptation.

Conscience is morality as it appears in the individual. For an individual such as Hitler, who was bullied and beaten by his father and lost his siblings and his mother, who grew up to adulthood in a society whose enormous transformation dislodged forces that were to exert such tremendous pressure on its structures as to gradually cause them to cave in and collapse, and who lived through the mass slaughter of World War I and all its subsequent turbulence, who was surrounded by violence on all sides – for such a person conscience did not speak in the same way as it speaks to those of us who have experienced none of the above. But it did speak to others of his generation, for none of the things Hitler experienced were unique to him, and nothing of what he wrote in Mein Kampf was unprecedented, which is to say that everything that exists in Mein Kampf also existed elsewhere in society at that time. One of Hitler's most important sources of inspiration in writing Mein Kampf was Henry Ford's book The International Jew. Ford, the American industrialist and car manufacturer, was famous throughout the world, and his book caused a stir when it was published in Germany. According to Ryback, the New York Times could report in 1922 that Hitler had a framed photograph of Ford on the wall next to his desk, and paid tribute to him in speeches at the time. Ryback cites Baldur von Schirach, a teenager when Ford's book came out, who claimed that he became an anti-Semite on reading it. "In those days this book made such a deep impression on myself and my friends because we saw in Henry Ford the representative of success, also the exponent of a progressive social policy." Other books Hitler read prior to writing Mein Kampf included Hans F. K. Günther's notorious Racial Typology of the German People, while Otto Strasser, a member of Hitler's staff, according to Ryback identified the main concepts of Mein Kampf as stemming from conversations Hitler conducted with Feder, Rosenberg, and Streicher and, most significantly, with Eckart, conversations in which books by authors such as Chamberlain and Lagarde were a staple topic.

None of this is mentioned in Mein Kampf, whose anti-Semitism and attendant theorizing is presented as something Hitler arrived at himself, long before he entered politics. He construes his anti-Semitism as something near a revelation, as if some crucial piece of a jigsaw had fallen into place, allowing him at last to grasp the great scheme of things. In Mein Kampf he ties this revelatory experience to his first autumn in Vienna, but since there is no evidence of any anti-Semitism in his life at that time, this can hardly be correct. However, the actual structure of his epiphany, the way it occurs, may still be an accurate account of the way he later experienced it. This is how he describes it:

> Today it is difficult, if not impossible, for me to say when the word "Jew" first gave me ground for special thoughts. At home I do not remember having heard the word during my father's lifetime. I believe that the old gentleman would have regarded any special emphasis on this term as cultural backwardness. In the course of his life he had arrived at more or less cosmopolitan views which, despite his pronounced national sentiments, not only remained intact, but also affected me to some extent.
> Likewise at school I found no occasion which could have led me to change this inherited picture.
> At the Realschule, to be sure, I did meet one Jewish boy who was treated by all of us with caution, but only because various experiences had led us to doubt his discretion and we did not particularly trust him; but neither I nor the others had any thoughts on the matter.
> Not until my fourteenth or fifteenth year did I begin to come across the word "Jew," with any frequency, partly in connection with political discussions. This filled me with a mild distaste, and I could not rid myself of an unpleasant feeling that always came over me whenever religious quarrels occurred in my presence.
> At that time I did not think anything else of the question.
> There were few Jews in Linz. In the course of the centuries their outward appearance had become Europeanized and had taken on a human look; in fact, I even took them for Germans. The absurdity of this idea did not dawn on me because I saw no distinguishing feature but the strange religion. The fact that they had, as I believed, been persecuted on this account sometimes almost turned my distaste at unfavorable remarks about them into horror.
> Thus far I did not so much as suspect the existence of an organized opposition to the Jews.
> Then I came to Vienna.
> Preoccupied by the abundance of my impressions in the architectural field, oppressed by the hardship of my own lot, I gained at first no insight into the inner stratification of the people in this gigantic city. Notwithstanding that Vienna in those days counted nearly two hundred thousand Jews among its two million inhabitants, I did not see them. In the first few weeks my eyes and my senses were not equal to the flood of values and ideas. Not until calm gradually returned and the agitated picture began to clear did I look around me more carefully in my new world, and then among other things I encountered the Jewish question.

I cannot maintain that the way in which I became acquainted with them struck me as particularly pleasant. For the Jew was still characterized for me by nothing but his religion, and therefore, on grounds of human tolerance, I maintained my rejection of religious attacks in this case as in others. Consequently the tone, particularly that of the Viennese anti-Semitic press, seemed to me unworthy of the cultural tradition of a great nation. I was oppressed by the memory of certain occurrences in the Middle Ages, which I should not have liked to see repeated. Since the newspapers in question did not enjoy an outstanding reputation (the reason for this, at that time, I myself did not precisely know), I regarded them more as the products of anger and envy than the results of a principled, though perhaps mistaken, point of view.

I was reinforced in this opinion by what seemed to me the far more dignified form in which the really big papers answered all these attacks, or, what seemed to me even more praiseworthy, failed to mention them; in other words, simply killed them with silence.

*I zealously read the so-called world press (*Neue Freie Presse, Wiener Tagblatt, etc.) and was amazed at the scope of what they offered their readers and the objectivity of individual articles. I respected the exalted tone, though the flamboyance of the style sometimes caused me inner dissatisfaction, or even struck me unpleasantly. Yet this may have been due to the rhythm of life in the whole metropolis.

These newspapers, however, frequently disgust him in the way they grovel to the Court, presenting themselves in glorified colors and reminding him of "the mating cry of a mountain cock." He finds them "a blemish on liberal democracy." Moreover, they wage war against the German Kaiser, Wilhelm II, whom they criticize "with supposed concern, yet, as it seemed to me, ill-concealed malice." The fact that the same press "made the most obsequious bows to every rickety horse in the Court" simultaneously airing doubts about the Kaiser and "poking its finger around in the wound" as if it were a scientific experiment, soon made him lose faith in them, whereas he found the Deutsches Volksblatt more decent in such matters. Another issue he had with the big newspapers was the way they cultivated admiration for France, which he found repugnant, writing:

> A man couldn't help feeling ashamed to be a German when he saw these saccharine hymns of praise to the "great cultural nation." This wretched licking of France's boots more than once made me throw down one of these "world newspapers." And on such occasions I sometimes picked up the Volksblatt, which, to be sure, seemed to me much smaller, but in these matters somewhat more appetizing. I was not in agreement with the sharp anti-Semitic tone, but from time to time I read arguments which gave me some food for thought.

When he first arrived in Vienna, he writes, he had felt opposed to the city's mayor, Dr. Karl Lueger, and to his Christian Socialist Party, finding both the man and the movement "reactionary." However, he came to change his opinion as he became more familiar with their politics, judging him more fairly, his attitude eventually growing into admiration. Lueger and his party were anti-Semites, and this, along with his lack of faith in the press, was what swayed him.

> My views with regard to anti-Semitism thus succumbed to the passage of time, and this was my greatest transformation of all.
> It cost me the greatest inner soul struggles, and only after months of battle between my reason and my sentiments did my reason begin to emerge victorious. Two years later, my sentiment had followed my reason, and from then on became its most loyal guardian and sentinel.
> At the time of this bitter struggle between spiritual education and cold reason, the visual instruction of the Vienna streets had performed invaluable > services. There came a time when I no longer, as in the first days, wandered blindly through the mighty city; now with open eyes I saw not only the buildings but also the people.

> Once, as I was strolling through the Inner City, I suddenly encountered an apparition in a black caftan and black hair locks. Is this a Jew? was my first thought.
> For, to be sure, they had not looked like that in Linz. I observed the man furtively and cautiously, but the longer I stared at this foreign face, scrutinizing feature for feature, the more my first question assumed a new form:
> Is this a German?
> As always in such cases, I now began to try to relieve my doubts by books. For a few hellers I bought the first anti-Semitic pamphlet of my life. Unfortunately, they all proceeded from the supposition that in principle the reader knew or even understood the Jewish question to a certain degree. Besides, the tone for the most part was such that doubts again arose in me, due in part to the dull and amazingly unscientific arguments favoring the thesis.
> I relapsed for weeks at a time, once even for months.
> The whole thing seemed to me so monstrous, the accusations so boundless, that, tormented by the fear of doing injustice, I again became anxious and uncertain.

The crucial argument that according to Mein Kampf removed that uncertainty and turned him conclusively into an anti-Semite has to do with Zionism and the attitude to it of liberal Jews, who rather than disowning the Zionists as non-Jews, as they perhaps would have done had it been purely a matter of faith, instead made sure that all Jews "remained unalterably of one piece."

> In a short time this apparent struggle between Zionistic and liberal Jews disgusted me; for it was false through and through, founded on lies and scarcely in keeping with the moral elevation and purity always claimed by this people.
> The cleanliness of this people, moral and otherwise, I must say, is a point in itself. By their very exterior you could tell that these were no lovers of water, and, > to your distress, you often knew it with your eyes closed. Later I often grew sick to my stomach from the smell of these caftan-wearers. Added to this, there was their unclean dress and their generally unheroic appearance.

> All this could scarcely be called very attractive; but it became positively repulsive when, in addition to their physical uncleanliness, you discovered the moral stains on this "chosen people."
> In a short time I was made more thoughtful than ever by my slowly rising insight into the type of activity carried on by the Jews in certain fields.
> Was there any form of filth or profligacy, particularly in cultural life, without at least one Jew involved in it?
> If you cut even cautiously into such an abscess, you found, like a maggot in a rotting body, often dazzled by the sudden light – a kike!
> What had to be reckoned heavily against the Jews in my eyes was when I became acquainted with their activity in the press, art, literature, and the theater. All the unctuous reassurances helped little or nothing. It sufficed to look at a billboard, to study the names of the men behind the horrible trash they advertised, to make you hard for a long time to come. This was pestilence, spiritual pestilence, worse than the Black Death of olden times, and the people were being infected with it! It goes without saying that the lower the intellectual level of one of these art manufacturers, the more unlimited his fertility will be, and the scoundrel ends up like a garbage separator, splashing his filth in the face of humanity. And bear in mind that there is no limit to their number; bear in mind that for one Goethe, Nature easily can foist on the world ten thousand of these scribblers who poison men's souls like germ-carriers of the worst sort, on their fellow men.
> It was terrible, but not to be overlooked, that precisely the Jew, in tremendous numbers, seemed chosen by Nature for this shameful calling.
> Is this why the Jews are called the "chosen people"?

He goes on to link the Jews with prostitution and the white slave traffic in Vienna, declaring that he no longer hesitated in bringing up the Jewish problem, but was determined to bring it to light, and that now that he knew what signs to look for he would constantly discover new connections and manifestations, until suddenly coming upon Jews in a position where he had least expected to find them:

> When I recognized the Jew as the leader of the Social Democracy, the scales dropped from my eyes. A long soul struggle had reached its conclusion . . .
> Gradually I began to hate them.
> All this had but one good side: that in proportion as the real leaders or at least the disseminators of Social Democracy came within my vision, my love for my people inevitably grew. For who, in view of the diabolical craftiness of these seducers, could damn the luckless victims? How hard it was, even for me, to get the better of this race of dialectical liars! And how futile was such success in dealing with people who twist the truth in your mouth, who without so much as a blush disavow the word they have just spoken, and in the very next minute take credit for it after all.
> No. The better acquainted I became with the Jew, the more forgiving I inevitably became toward the worker . . .
> Thus I began to make myself familiar with the founders of this doctrine, in order to study the foundations of the movement. If I reached my goal more quickly than at first I had perhaps ventured to believe, it was thanks to my newly acquired, though at that time not very profound, knowledge of the Jewish question. This alone enabled me to draw a practical comparison between the reality and the theoretical flimflam of the founding fathers of Social Democracy, since it taught me to understand the language of the Jewish people, who speak in order to conceal or at least to veil their thoughts; their real aim is not therefore to be found in the lines themselves, but slumbers well concealed between them.
> For me this was the time of the greatest spiritual upheaval I have ever had to go through. I had ceased to be a weak-kneed cosmopolitan and become an anti-Semite.

The first phenomena he attributes to the Jews are all concerned with cultural decay. The decay of the press, the decay of literature, the decay of art, in other words decay within the public domain. This decay, perceived by many, could be seen either as the expression of moral decay or as the cause of moral decay. Hitler believed the latter, and his implication of the Jews in this respect may similarly be understood in two ways, as the expression either of the base morals of the Jewish people or of an attempt to corrupt existing moral structures, in other words to destroy the people from within. Hitler seems to believe it to be a combination of the two and that it is through the policies of the Social Democrats that the categorization and calculation applied to send those areas into decay, absent in other areas, become visible. Opinions, beliefs, and morals, whether expressed publicly or by the individual in private, in a work of art or a political utterance, are by such reasoning relative notions, like degrees of good and bad on a scale of morals. Eventually he shifts this relative boundary in toward the absolute, by posing the question: "Have we an objective right to struggle for our self-preservation, or is this justified only subjectively within ourselves?" Or, put differently, are culture and morality relative, something we decide for ourselves, or is their basis objective? Is there something external that lends credence to our moral beliefs, something external that defines our culture, something fundamental and given? He believes the answer to be yes, setting the boundary between nationalism and Marxism, which is basically an expression of the boundary between the German and the Jewish, in a notional space he calls the handiwork of the Lord. He writes the following:

> The Jewish doctrine of Marxism rejects the aristocratic principle of Nature and replaces the eternal privilege of power and strength by the mass of numbers and their dead weight. Thus it denies the value of personality in man, contests the significance of nationality and race, and thereby withdraws from humanity the premise of its existence and its culture. As a foundation of the universe, this doctrine would bring about the end of any order intellectually conceivable to man. And as, in this greatest of all recognizable organisms, the result of an application of such a law could only be chaos, on earth it could only be destruction for the inhabitants of this planet.

> If, with the help of his Marxist creed, the Jew is victorious over the other peoples of the world, his crown will be the funeral wreath of humanity and this planet will, as it did thousands of years ago, move through the ether devoid of men.
> Eternal Nature inexorably avenges the infringement of her commands.
> Hence today I believe that I am acting in accordance with the will of the Almighty Creator: by defending myself against the Jew, I am fighting for the work of the Lord.

The most significant rhetorical turn in this line of reasoning, forming the kernel of Hitler's political ideology as it is formulated in Mein Kampf, and thereby the point from which all subsequent actions performed by the Nazis issue, including those which in sum comprised the most comprehensive disaster in our human history, the Holocaust, is its arguments to the effect that anti-Semitism is not emotionally founded but the very opposite, a rational standpoint at which he has arrived by way of common-sense reasoning. This is a crucial distinction. Crucial for Hitler himself, in that if the hatred he felt toward the Jews had no rational foundation, which is to say if it were not accountable for by reference to something inherently Jewish, then it would necessarily come from him and be the expression of his inner feelings, whose existence he barely acknowledged, and crucial for those he was addressing, since by stating that his first, intuitive emotion in respect to the Jews was that anti-Semitism was a terrible thing, he thereby preempted an important and very human objection, that the Jews were people like them, with joys and sorrows, children and parents, friends and colleagues, and so one could not possibly hate them, could not turn against them, it being unreasonable and wrong. This is what you feel, Hitler says, and there is nothing wrong in feeling it, I did too. Anti-Semitism is outrageous. The pogroms are a terrible thing. But these feelings, which are deeply human, cloak the true state of affairs. And it is thus, concealed as if in disguise, that the activity of the Jew, which is directed toward destroying precisely what is good, precisely that which gives rise to the feeling that anti-Semitism is wrong, is taking place. It must be exposed, and this can only occur by way of rational arguments such as those he provides in his book. This is the rhetorical crux: I say things as they are. Germanness is associated with differences: the individual has value as a person, in that they belong to a race and are a part of that race's political expression, which is the nation-state. The value of what is German resides in its spiritual ideals.

Jewishness, equated with Marxism, is associated with sameness: for the Jew and the Marxist alike there are no individual differences between people, the individual is expendable, of value only in belonging to the mass, and there are no differences of race, which is to say no Volk and no nation-states. Jewish-Marxist value is material and monetary. Everything is the same in the Marxist world, and that lack of differentiation, that reality of no distinctions, is akin to chaos. Germanness is founded on values that form the basis of moral distinctions, good and bad, which is to say the qualitative, whereas the Jewish-Marxist domain is based on numbers and masses, which is to say the quantitative. Germanness finds its legitimacy in nature, which is to say the living world, the biological, which natural science has divided into classes, families, and species, and whose principle, the very principle of life itself, is the survival instinct, the right of the strongest. The Jewish-Marxist domain too finds its legitimacy in nature, but in that part of nature that is lifeless, which is to say in the material, that which is dead. The consequence of the Jewish-Marxist view is chaos, sameness, eventually death and the absolute void, which is the final and most undifferentiated state of all.

A biological mind-set comes out on several levels of the text; when Hitler writes about areas of cultural life in which Jews feature strongly, they are likened to an abscess into which "you cut," a dissection that reveals, like a maggot in a rotting corpse, a Jew. The activities of the Jews are likened to a pestilence, worse even than the Black Death, a poison. All this, filth, plague, poison, decay, comes from outside the human sphere to spread within it, eventually to destroy it. To Hitler's mind, the body is at the outset pure, morally and physically, and may remain so by maintaining its remoteness from other bodies in a meticulous system of constraints regulated by morals. Syphilis, he later states, diseased sexuality, comes of prostituting love, which in turn is the fault of the Jews. “This Jewification of our spiritual life and mammonizing of our mating instinct will sooner or later destroy our entire offspring,” he writes. Money converts all values into pecuniary values, even the most hallowed of all, love, and the consequence is not just decay of the spirit, but also decay of the flesh, which becomes sick and riddled with disease. The image of the Jew as a kind of sprinkler spraying filth into the face of humanity would seem to adequately sum up Hitler’s mind-set, the threat of transgression, diffusion, disease, and chaos, the worst imaginable scenario, finding simple, striking, yet absolutely ambivalent expression.

But thus far in his reasoning the distinction between the Jewish and the German is yet to be conceived as absolute, Marxist-Jewish understanding of the human domain as being amenable to quantification, capable of being weighed and measured, expressed in numbers, is yet to be construed as an expression of Jewish nature, that is as a part of the racial makeup of the Jews, but as belonging to their culture. The right to fight for one’s moral beliefs and culture is something Hitler finds in nature, where the strongest prevails, which makes the struggle absolute, though as yet it is not the object of his endeavor. This changes, however, as he proceeds to racial anthropology toward the end of the first volume of Mein Kampf, following his account of the capitulation and the resentment and hateful darkening of his soul it precipitated.

What racial anthropology does is to transpose elements of nature onto culture. Nature is the biological world of animals and plants, of all things living, and it expresses nothing other than itself, refers to nothing other than itself; it is a godless universe Hitler writes about, though by no means valueless, for the principles that govern nature, its biological laws, are in themselves generative of value, and among those values the survival and development of the species is primary. That value is regulated by two principles, delimitation and selection.

> There are some truths which are so obvious that for this very reason they are not seen or at least not recognized by ordinary people. They sometimes pass by such truisms as though blind and are most astonished when someone suddenly discovers what everyone really ought to know . . .

Thus men without exception wander about in the garden of Nature; they imagine that they know practically everything and yet with few exceptions pass blindly by one of the most patent principles of Nature's rule: the inner segregation of the species of all living beings on this earth.

Even the most superficial observation shows that Nature's restricted form of propagation and increase is an almost rigid basic law of all the innumerable forms of expression of her vital urge. Every animal mates only with a member of the same species. The titmouse seeks the titmouse, the finch the finch, the stork the stork, the field mouse the field mouse, the dormouse the dormouse, the wolf the she-wolf, etc.

Only unusual circumstances can change this, primarily the compulsion of captivity or any other cause that makes it impossible to mate within the same species. But then Nature begins to resist this with all possible means, and her most visible protest consists either in refusing further capacity for propagation to bastards or in limiting the fertility of later offspring; in most cases, however, she takes away the power of resistance to disease or hostile attacks . . .

The consequence of this racial purity, universally valid in Nature, is not only the sharp outward delimitation of the various races, but their uniform character in themselves. The fox is always a fox, the goose a goose, the tiger a tiger, etc., and the difference can lie at most in the varying measure of force, strength, intelligence, dexterity, endurance, etc., of the individual specimens. But you will never find a fox who in his inner attitude might, for example, show humanitarian tendencies toward geese, as similarly there is no cat with a friendly inclination toward mice.

Therefore, here, too, the struggle among themselves arises less from inner aversion than from hunger and love. In both cases, Nature looks on calmly, with satisfaction, in fact. In the struggle for daily bread all those who are weak and sickly or less determined succumb, while the struggle of the males for the female grants the right or opportunity to propagate only to the healthiest. And struggle is always a means for improving a species' health and power of resistance and, therefore, a cause of its higher development.

This is a duplication of Darwin's notion of the survival of the fittest, laden with values. Delimitation, purity, development, these are Hitler's key concepts, first establishing them in nature, then transposing them onto the culture on the premise that man is first and foremost a biological being, but also that man's ideas and conceptions are keyed to the biological in such a way that superior ideals may be developed only by superior races, and that the survival of these ideals is a function of the survival of the race. Such an ideal is unselfishness. All living organisms possess the instinct of self-preservation, which in the case of the most primitive species operates entirely on the I. What makes the Aryan race superior, according to Hitler, is not that the instinct of self-preservation is stronger than in other races, but that it expresses itself in a more advanced manner, rising above simple egotism, allowing its own needs to recede into the background so that it may work for others, make sacrifice for others, working for the good of a community greater than itself.

> The Aryan is not greatest in his mental qualities as such, but in the extent of his willingness to put all his abilities in the service of the community . . .
> This state of mind, which subordinates the interests of the ego to the conservation of the community, is really the first premise for every truly human culture. From it alone can arise all the great works of mankind, which bring the founder little reward, but the richest blessings to posterity. Yes, from it alone can we understand how so many are able to bear up faithfully under a scanty life which imposes on them nothing but poverty and frugality, but gives the community the foundations of its existence. Every worker, every peasant, every inventor, official, etc., who works without ever being able to achieve any happiness or prosperity for himself, is a representative of this lofty idea, even if the deeper meaning of his activity remains hidden in him.
> What applies to work as the foundation of human sustenance and all human progress is true to an even greater degree for the defense of man and his culture. In giving one's own life for the existence of the community lies the crown of all sense of sacrifice. It is this alone that prevents what human hands have built from being overthrown by human hands or destroyed by Nature.

> Our own German language possesses a word which magnificently designates this kind of activity: Pflichterfullung (fulfillment of duty); it means not to be self-sufficient but to serve the community.

The biological perspective on the human applies in other words not only to the purely physical, is not simply a question of hair color, eye color, skin color, height, and strength, but also of less tangible properties and ideals, which is to say of what traditionally is thought of as the spiritual side of man: this too is a matter of biology, race, and blood.

The objection that nature and culture are two separate entities, and that culture is superior to nature in exploiting it to its own ends, managing and mastering it, is countered by Hitler in the following argument:

> Here, of course, we encounter the objection of the modern pacifist, as truly Jewish in its effrontery as it is stupid! "Man's role is to overcome Nature!"
> Millions thoughtlessly parrot this Jewish nonsense and end up by really imagining that they themselves represent a kind of conqueror of Nature; though in this they dispose of no other weapon than an idea, and at that such a miserable one, that if it were true no world at all would be conceivable.
> But quite aside from the fact that man has never yet conquered Nature in anything, but at most has caught hold of and tried to lift one or another corner of her immense gigantic veil of eternal riddles and secrets, that in reality he invents nothing but only discovers everything, that he does not dominate Nature, but has only risen on the basis of his knowledge of various laws and secrets of Nature to be lord over those other living creatures who lack this knowledge – quite aside from all this, an idea cannot overcome the preconditions for the development and being of humanity, since the idea itself depends only on man. Without human beings there is no human idea in this world, therefore, the idea as such is always conditioned by the presence of human beings and hence of all the laws which created the precondition for their existence.
> And not only that! Certain ideas are even tied up with certain men. This applies most of all to those ideas whose content originates, not in an exact scientific truth, but in the world of emotion, or, as it is so beautifully and clearly > expressed today, reflects an "inner experience." All these ideas, which have nothing to do with cold logic as such, but represent only pure expressions of feeling, ethical conceptions, etc., are chained to the existence of men, to whose intellectual imagination and creative power they owe their existence. Precisely in this case the preservation of these definite races and men is the precondition for the existence of these ideas.

If there are superior races, there must also be inferior races. And if high ideals and noble qualities are associated with biological race, lack of ideals and poor qualities must be too. In this system, where everything is biology and heredity, the big threat is therefore the degeneration of the race, which can happen from within, as a result of superior individuals mating with inferior, and from without, by means of an inferior race merging with a superior. Hitler gives an example of such blood-mingling and its dangers by pointing to the differences in North American and South American cultures, where in the former instance the population is largely made up of Germanic elements intermingled with inferior peoples only to a small extent, whereas in the latter instance the population is largely made up of Latin immigrants who often mixed with the original inhabitants, on a large scale, as he puts it.

Hitler divides mankind into three categories: founders of culture, bearers of culture, destroyers of culture. The Aryans represent the first, the Jews the last. The Jews possess a strongly developed instinct for self-preservation, but their readiness for sacrifice extends only seldom beyond the purely egotistical instinct of individual preservation. Their sense of solidarity, seemingly so robust, is in Hitler's view nothing but the primitive instinct of the herd.

> In the Jewish people the will to self-sacrifice does not go beyond the individual's naked instinct of self-preservation. Their apparently great sense of solidarity is based on the very primitive herd instinct that is seen in many other living creatures in this world. It is a noteworthy fact that the herd instinct leads to mutual support only as long as common danger makes this seem useful or inevitable. The same pack of wolves which has just fallen on its prey together disintegrates when hunger abates into its individual beasts. The same is true of horses which > try to defend themselves against an assailant in a body, but scatter again as soon as the danger is past.

> It is similar with the Jew. His sense of sacrifice is only apparent. It exists only as long as the existence of the individual makes it absolutely necessary. However, as soon as the common enemy is conquered, the danger threatening all averted and the booty hidden, the apparent harmony of the Jews among themselves ceases, again making way for their old causal tendencies. The Jew is only united when a common danger forces him to be or a common booty entices him; if these two grounds are lacking, the qualities of the crassest egoism come into their own, and in the twinkling of an eye the united people turns into a horde of rats, fighting bloodily among themselves . . .
> So it is absolutely wrong to infer any ideal sense of sacrifice in the Jews from the fact that they stand together in struggle, or, better expressed, in the plundering of their fellow men.
> Here again the Jew is led by nothing but the naked egoism of the individual.
> That is why the Jewish state – which should be the living organism for preserving and increasing a race – is completely unlimited as to territory. For a state formation to have a definite spatial setting always presupposes an idealistic attitude on the part of the state-race, and especially a correct interpretation of the concept of work. In the exact measure in which this attitude is lacking, any attempt at forming, even of preserving, a spatially delimited state fails. And thus the basis on which alone culture can arise is lacking.
> Hence the Jewish people, despite all apparent intellectual qualities, is without any true culture, and especially without any culture of its own. For what sham culture the Jew today possesses is the property of other peoples, and for the most part it is ruined in his hands.

If this is the case, that human properties and race are connected, that culture and human ideals are in essence expressions of biology, that the lowest, the Jewish, exists within the highest, the Aryan, with no clearly defined boundaries between the two biological entities, then racial intermingling indeed represents the system's greatest peril, overshadowing all other issues. The struggle to maintain racial purity overrides all other struggles.

> Everything on this earth is capable of improvement. Every defeat can become the father of a subsequent victory, every lost war the cause of a later resurgence, every hardship the fertilization of human energy, and from every oppression the forces for a new spiritual rebirth can come – as long as the blood is preserved pure.
> The lost purity of the blood alone destroys inner happiness forever, plunges man into the abyss for all time, and the consequences can nevermore be eliminated from body and spirit.
> Only by examining and comparing all other problems of life in the light of this one question shall we see how absurdly petty they are by this standard. They are all limited in time – but the question of preserving or not preserving the purity of the blood will endure as long as there are men.

For Hitler, the Jewish question was in other words the single most important political issue in Germany in 1924, more important than poverty, more important than the Armistice and the Treaty of Versailles, inflation, and unemployment, because, in contrast to all those other issues, it was bound up with the notion of the authentic and the most fundamental of all things, life itself, human life. As such, the body was drawn into the very center of the political field. The body was an expression of the state, whose purpose it was to keep the body pure and ensure it developed in a desirable manner, physically and morally, and that it did not propagate with those inferior to itself. The biological perspective was superordinate to the individual, the human being as a body came before the human being as a person, and the properties of the individual were unimportant, for regardless of how good and unselfish a Jew might be, regardless of how hard-working and innocent, he or she was nonetheless guilty by virtue simply of being a Jew. In this way, the individual Jew was absolved of guilt, he or she being unable to do anything about it, whereas the Jews collectively were condemned, associated with a whole range of properties they could never escape, and without having any say in the matter.

This is exactly how we have always regarded animals, which are condemned to expressing themselves by way of the properties of their species, a relationship they are unable to escape, a cat or a rat always at first being a cat or a rat and only then perhaps the cat or the rat. To conduct court proceedings against a cat or a rat would be meaningless, for they possess no guilt, are mere expressions of their species, without a say in the matter, a concept such as morality would be equally meaningless when applied to their lives. In the event of their doing something we find undesirable, making a nuisance of themselves in some way, nothing stands in the way of our removing them, for since they cannot possess guilt, they accordingly have no individual rights. Animals are outside the law, unless as a collective, a protected species for instance, but this too is independent of inherent properties, provided they are not directly harmful to man.

The biological perspective, whereby the human primarily is regarded in terms of race, a collective with certain properties, characteristics, and ideals and, secondly, in terms of individuals deemed worthy or unworthy according to the race to which they belong, and only then as people with particular names and faces, would, if it were to be applied in any future state, require the introduction of new legislation and a new system of law, the notion of individual responsibility and personal guilt standing so firmly in culture, with roots going back to the beginnings of civilization. The only exception to this rule of civilization would be war, only in war could individual responsibility and personal guilt be abolished, for in war every soldier on the other side was firstly an enemy, representative of a collective, who could be killed as a matter of course, and only then an individual. It is this collectivity that is signaled by the uniform, and which marching makes manifest: the one, the individual, the personal name and face are always subordinate to the community, the all, the name of the nation, and the flag. These two aspects, both canceling out the individual, one by construing the human in terms of biology, bound by the laws of nature, the other by seeing the human as a creature at war, a state in which the laws of civil society are nullified, are what makes Hitler's reasoning as to the Jews in Mein Kampf possible. Both perspectives were common in the society in which he wrote, directly and indirectly. Alongside Henry Ford's The International Jew: The World's Foremost

Problem, Günther's Racial Typology of the German People, and the writings of Chamberlain, Eckart, and Rosenberg, the American writer Madison Grant's book The Passing of the Great Race was likewise important to Hitler at this time. Ryback states that Hitler referred to it as "my Bible" and traces several lines of argument in Mein Kampf back to its pages.

But such racial thinking was more than paranoid, pseudoscientific theory, it was also widespread in serious scientific environments in academia, where it was presented as objective truth on a footing with other scientific truths, thereby lending legitimacy to Ford's, Grant's, and Hitler's thoughts, for if they carried its consequences to the furthest extreme, they could nevertheless claim their ideas to be based on an accepted notion that race was a relevant compartmentalizer of human beings, and that racially pure and impure existed, based on facts that could be expressed in figures. In 1926, the year after Mein Kampf, a work came out in Sweden called The Racial Characters of the Swedish Nation, published by scholars of Uppsala University affiliated to the Swedish State Institute for Race Biology. It was a far-reaching and prestigious publication, setting standards for similar works that would subsequently see the light of day elsewhere. In one of its essays, "An Orientating Synopsis of the Racial Status of Europe," Rolf Nordenstreng defines "race" as follows:

> The meaning of the word race, from a scientific point of view, is a group of individuals of one and the same species, which differ from other individuals of this same species in showing a peculiar combination of certain hereditary characters. A race is always a product of selective factors in cooperation with still unknown factors, which in some way or other transform the hereditary characters.
> A race is a purely anthropological concept, its characteristics are above all physical. To be sure, there must also be mental differences among the races, and these are by no means less important; but they are exceedingly difficult to find out and to prove. At present they are little more than guesswork, and though the attempts that have been made to define the mental characters of the races are likely to contain a great deal of truth, based upon good and sound observations, they also contain a considerable quantity of prejudiced and arbitrary statements. In time there may be developed something like a scientific racial psychology – at present nonexistent.

As rather certain we may venture to state the existence of the following five greater races: 1) the Nordic, 2) the East Baltic, 3) the Mediterranean, 4) the Alpine, and 5) the Dinaric. To these may be added, though they are not in the proper sense of the word European, but mainly Asiatic, the Anatolian (Armenoid, Anterior-Asiatic), and the Semitic (Araboid) race, the latter name being a bad one, because it is also a linguistic term, but inevitable, as no better one has been suggested.

The name of the Nordic race is not quite appropriate, the adjective being in many languages used also as a linguistic term, meaning "Scandinavian"; most persons of this race speak languages that are not Scandinavian. But the term is customary, and North Europe together with North Germany is the distributing center of the race, and it is in the northern countries, on the Scandinavian Peninsula, that it is found most commonly and in its relatively greatest purity. This race it is which one often hears called the "Teutonic" or "Germanic," and it has also been termed the "Kymric." German archaeologists sometimes call it the "row-grave-type," Reihengräbertypus. Its characteristics are a light, translucent, rosy skin; a fair, sometimes reddish, soft, often wavy or curly hair; a rich beard-growth; clear blue or blue-gray eyes; a tall stature, with proportionately long legs and a firm, elastic gait with stretched legs; a strong frame; a long and rather narrow face with a narrow, usually high, straight, or somewhat bent nose, often with a little bump at the transition from the nasal bone to the cartilage; a narrow, high nasal root; very slightly or not at all prominent cheekbones; nonsalient jaws with the rows of teeth standing nearly vertically, each against the other; somewhat thin lips; a strongly projecting chin; a narrow, somewhat sloping forehead; weak, but quite perceptible eyebrow ridges; rather deep-set eyes; a long and rather narrow braincase (head length about 195 mm, cephalic index about 77) with a nearly horizontal crown line and strongly elongated occiput. It must, however, be observed that both the color of the hair and the shape of the nose vary a great deal. Nearly every imaginable shade of fair hair color occurs, from flaxen yellow through reddish yellow to light golden-brown > and through light ashy-blond to the darker grayish-blond. And together with the straight and the bent noses there are somewhat cocked ones, with the tip turned a little upward and the bridge somewhat depressed in the middle – a shape widely distributed over the whole sweep of this race.

> The Semitic race, which perhaps also might be called the Araboid race, because its characteristics seem to be more common among the Arabs than anywhere else, is considered to be an offshoot from the Mediterranean race. It differs from this race mainly in having a higher, more bent, but also thin and narrow nose; fuller, though not thick lips; a rather light, though never rosy complexion; and an almond-shaped eye (the inner angle of the eye being more rounded, the outer angle more pointed). The hollow between the chin and the lower lip lies higher than in other races. There is a great deal of Semitic blood in the Sephardic Jews and less in the Ashkenazic ones, and very likely there must be some of it in the population of most South European countries.

Cephalic index is the percentile relation between head breadth and head length, German Kopfindex, not to be confounded with the corresponding relation for the cranium, German Schädelindex, as is stated in the introduction to one of the book's chapters, full of tables, graphs, and diagrams detailing the results of the scientists' fieldwork throughout the country. The Racial Characters of the Swedish Nation measures the cephalic index in all Swedish landskap (provinces), all Swedish län (counties), all Swedish rural and urban communities, the latter including the four biggest cities, mapping distributions according to occupation and social class and drawing comparisons across the other Scandinavian countries, and this is repeated for all other anthropological characteristics – trunk length, arm length, leg length, head breadth, head length, face breadth, morphological face height, morphological face index, jugo-frontal index and jugo-mandibular index, nose, ear, nasal bridge profile, eye color, eyebrow color, pubic hair color, all broken down into the various geographical and social divisions, all then correlated in a dedicated section on the relations between anthropological characters and indices revealing, for example, the relation between face height and arm length, rural community and province. The final part of the book consists of full-page plates, photographs of naked racial types, children, women, and men, a farmer from Norrbotten for instance appearing in the section East Baltic Types, Relatively Pure, a nomad from Jämtland in the section Lapp Prototype, Relatively Pure, a working man from Lappland in the section Race-Mixed Types, East Baltic-Lapp.

The most important difference between these texts and Hitler's has to do with their style. The racial theory expressed in Nordenstreng's article is penned in the objective, matter-of-fact style employed by all scholarly discourse, a style we take to indicate truth. Truth, objectivity, meticulousness, overview, certainty, insight, all these things are inherent in the style. The figures, the tables, the Latin terminology, everything connotes truth and absolute reliability. This is reinforced by the text delimiting and keeping apart what it can state with certainty and what it cannot state with certainty. A link between race and psychology, a biological connection, is likely but cannot yet be asserted on the available evidence. In this way, the text suggests that everything else it says about race may be asserted with certainty on the available evidence, at the same time as it opens the possibility of race and psychology indeed being biologically linked. The immediate association of truth with the style employed here, its rhetorical figures and tropes, is plain to us now that the content has been so discredited, not only as speculative and unscientific, but also as dangerous and, at root, evil.

But wherein does this evil lie for us? In the scholarly, scientific style there is solicitude too, for what is presented here is knowledge, insights gained by these scientists, not on their own behalf, but on behalf of the community, and this knowledge is what they impart to us in their articles and papers. Solicitude and also a clear notion of progress; the field is new, no one has studied these things before, no one has considered them before, but with the giant strides taken in biology in the latter part of the nineteenth century, with Darwin's groundbreaking explanatory theory of the origin of species, and before that Linnaeus's all-encompassing taxonomy, this advance, the establishment of an institute of racial theory and the opening up of an entirely new field of research, we approach deeper insights into the human species that will yield obvious opportunities for further progress, for only a small step from this racial biology lay eugenics, the new theory of racial hygiene, whereby the health and procreation of entire peoples could be steered in whichever direction was found to be desirable, for instance by sterilizing undesirable elements such as schizophrenics, the mentally ill, habitual criminals, vagrants, and Gypsies, as actually took place in Sweden, Norway, the United States, and Germany in the 1930s and 1940s.

This occurred on the basis of this research, under state auspices, pushing back the boundaries of what the state was and could be: the concept of public health goes back to this period, for the idea that the state should be responsible for the health and well-being of the individual is by no means a given, and its attendant notions of healthy minds in healthy bodies, of poverty and darkness and poor health being swept away as the sun shone in on hardship and abjection, which then would jump up invigorated, of poor children being sent to the countryside in summer, of health visitors and vaccinations, were all about the conjugation of body and state. And it was carried out by decent people with decent intentions, the thought that it might be wrong to sterilize a woman suffering from delusions and unable to look after herself being not at all obvious, since there was a risk, if she became pregnant, that she might pass on her affliction to the detriment of her child, and thereby also burden society as a whole.

The division of human beings into the racially pure and the racially impure, superior and inferior by implication, belongs to the same paradigm, and it is this scientification or biologization of the human, and nothing else, that makes Hitler's racial theory, and his subsequent racial policy, possible. Without it, anti-Semitism is just an irrational emotion, an obvious scapegoating, a paranoia within the culture that can be taken more or less seriously, but never be employed as the basis of any political program. Hitler kept up with international research in eugenics as it was conducted in Europe and the United States, before and after he became Reich chancellor. He was familiar with the work of leading American eugenicists such as Leon Whitney, director of the American Eugenics Society, Charles Davenport, a Harvard-educated biologist and prominent representative of the American sterilization program, and Paul Popenoe of the Human Betterment Foundation. Ryback quotes the following from a speech given by Hitler in the mid-1930s:

> Now that we know the laws of heredity it is possible to a large extent to prevent unhealthy and severely handicapped beings from coming into the world. I have studied with interest the laws of several American states concerning prevention of reproduction by people whose progeny would, in all probability, be of no value or be injurious to the racial stock.

According to Ryback, Hitler also met the American eugenicist and fiercely anti-Semitic racial theorist Lothrop Stoddard in 1939, when Stoddard was working as a correspondent in Berlin and received a personal invitation from the Führer on account of his work in the field. Stoddard promised Hitler that he would not make reference to their meeting, but he would later state that Hitler's handshake had been firm, though he had not sought eye contact, subsequently writing more generally of Germany's relationship with racial hygiene:

> The relative emphasis which Hitler gave racialism and eugenics many years ago foreshadows the respective interest toward the two subjects in Germany today. Outside Germany, the reverse is true, due chiefly to Nazi treatment of its Jewish minority. Inside Germany, the Jewish problem is regarded as a passing phenomenon, already settled in principle and soon to be settled in fact by the physical elimination of the Jews themselves from the Third Reich. It is the regeneration of the Germanic stock with which public opinion is most concerned and which it seeks to further in various ways.

The scientification of racial thinking, the entire scientific apparatus that was set up around it, with its specially constructed instruments for cranial measurement, its tables and graphs, its Latin terminology, and technical vocabulary, lent such thinking legitimacy, and although Hitler's book contains no trace of the scholarly style, it is nevertheless Mein Kampf that makes the connection between culture and nature possible, the coupling of state and body, politics and biology, all so central to Hitler's ideology. Mein Kampf is an extreme version of that mind-set, and while many found it exaggerated and bordering on the paranoid and could not believe he meant it seriously, certainly not as he approached the corridors of power and thereby became outwardly more respectable, they did not question the fundamental goal of such a policy, which was to improve the stock, the race, to lift it upward into a resplendently healthy, morally unassailable future.

Hatred of the Jews was nothing new, it was prevalent in the world of Faust; Martin Luther hated the Jews, and their persecution went far back into history, as ancient as themselves, an integral part of their own self-image and of the cultures that surrounded them, as though somehow it were embedded in the villages and forests, a mythical fabric from long before the Enlightenment, yet still in force, for example in the great impoverished rural areas of Poland, where the familiar prejudices relating to the Jews – that they were rich, that they hoodwinked and cheated people, that they took care of their own – were ingrained in the culture and explanatory of the indigenous population's hardships and miseries. The Jew-hatred of Hitler and the Nazis, however, was new in the sense that it was related to modernity, to the cities and the mass human, not to the Jewish peddler Papst encountered in Hamsun's Wayfarers but to international finance and international Marxism. Racial theory was new as well, and provided the mind-set with a legitimacy that removed it from the mythical and placed it firmly within the realms of the rational and the modern. Most striking, however, is the coming together of the mythical and the modern in propaganda, where the images of that ancient hatred – the Jews portrayed as rats, the Jews portrayed as pigs, the Jews portrayed as evil – are projected through the new technology, in moving pictures on cinema screens, living voices on the radio, drawn thereby into a world of automobiles, neon lights, factories, telephones, and films, as its antithesis and primitive prelude.

Hitler was just as forthright about his thinking on propaganda in Mein Kampf as he was about his anti-Semitism, his antidemocratism and his Lebensraum ideology, whose consequence could never be anything else but war.

But whereas his anti-Semitism and nationalism were idealistic in nature, amalgamated by racial biology, his thoughts on propaganda were pragmatic. Propaganda was the most important means of carrying through his idealistic aims, and so convinced was he of its power that he was quite open about it. As Peter Sloterdijk notes, Hitler was so sure of himself when it came to the potency of propaganda that he felt he could afford to reveal his recipe. Hitler referred to propaganda as a weapon, "a frightful one in the hand of an expert."

> The second really decisive question was this: To whom should propaganda be addressed? To the scientifically trained intelligentsia or to the less educated masses?
> It must be addressed always and exclusively to the masses . . .
> The function of propaganda does not lie in the scientific training of the individual, but in calling the masses' attention to certain facts, processes, necessities, etc., whose significance is thus for the first time placed within their field of vision.
> The whole art consists in doing this so skillfully that everyone will be convinced that the fact is real, the process necessary, the necessity correct, etc. But since propaganda is not and cannot be the necessity in itself, since its function, like the poster, consists in attracting the attention of the crowd, and not in educating those who are already educated or who are striving after education and knowledge, its effect for the most part must be aimed at the emotions and only to a very limited degree at the so-called intellect.
> All propaganda must be popular and its intellectual level must be adjusted to the most limited intelligence among those it is addressed to. Consequently, the greater the mass it is intended to reach, the lower its purely intellectual level will have to be. But if, as in propaganda for sticking out a war, the aim is to influence a whole people, we must avoid excessive intellectual demands on our public, and too much caution cannot be exerted in this direction. The more modest its > intellectual ballast, the more exclusively it takes into consideration the emotions of the masses, the more effective it will be. And this is the best proof of the soundness or unsoundness of a propaganda campaign, and not success in pleasing a few scholars or young aesthetes.

> The art of propaganda lies in understanding the emotional ideas of the great masses and finding, through a psychologically correct form, the way to the attention and thence to the heart of the broad masses. The fact that our bright boys do not understand this merely shows how mentally lazy and conceited they are . . .
> The receptivity of the great masses is very limited, their intelligence is small, but their power of forgetting is enormous. In consequence of these facts, all effective propaganda must be limited to a very few points and must harp on these in slogans until the last member of the public understands what you want him to understand by your slogan. As soon as you sacrifice this slogan and try to be many-sided, the effect will piddle away, for the crowd can neither digest nor retain the material offered. In this way the result is weakened and in the end entirely canceled out. Thus we see that propaganda must follow a simple line and correspondingly the basic tactics must be psychologically sound.

The most crucial aspect of propaganda, however, is not its simplicity, that it may be understandable even to the least intelligent member of the crowd, but rather that it is entirely subjective, without so much as a hint of objectivity about it, and displaying not the slightest form of nuance as to any subject.

> What, for example, would we say about a poster that was supposed to advertise a new soap and that described other soaps as "good"?
> We would only shake our heads.
> Exactly the same applies to political advertising.
> The function of propaganda is, for example, not to weigh and ponder the rights of different people, but exclusively to emphasize the one right which it has set out to argue for. Its task is not to make an objective study of the truth, insofar as it favors the enemy, and then set it before the masses with academic fairness; its task is to serve our own right, always and unflinchingly.

What is intriguing about this section of Mein Kampf is that Hitler is telling it like it is, propaganda is manipulation, often presenting pure lies so repeatedly and so insistently as to make them truths. One would think that for a politician to write something of this nature would be to undermine his entire credibility and kill him off politically, yet Hitler ventures to do so for two reasons: firstly because propaganda is a means to an end, that end being so important and so just, so beneficial to society, that any means are permitted in search of its achievement, including lies – pragmatism exists for the sake of idealism and is its servant, not the other way around; secondly because he is so certain propaganda works and is so robust in itself as not to be threatened by any such synopsis or admission; this is what he is saying, that the complex, the objectivized, the nuanced will never reach a wide segment of any audience and find effect there, this moreover being true of his own words here.

The dialectic is anything but unfamiliar to us in our day, everyone knows that advertising, which exists all around us to such an extent that it fills our lives almost to the brim, is manipulative and untrue, that the picture advertising paints of the world is a lie, which nevertheless does not stop us from being influenced by it and doing what it wants us to do: I know that drinking Coca-Cola is not going to turn me into an unworried American teenager, but I still prefer it to Jolly Cola when I am out buying in the supermarket, and I know too that Dove soap is basically the same as any other brand, the only difference being in the packaging and advertising budget, but whose soap do I put in my basket? Advertising seems immune to any critical insight into its nature, and in this respect Hitler was right. As such, advertising is indeed related to beauty and charisma: we may want complexity and knowledge, but in the final analysis other, simpler, more immutable forces prevail. The difference between our society and Hitler's is that we have banished all such forces and all that we associate with them to an unthreatening domain, one which is least accountable to reality, the world of fiction and images, which is to say entertainment culture, refusing to allow them into other domains that are highly accountable to reality, such as politics, education, administration, or the private sphere, unless in the guise of the inauthentic. The fact that we operate with one compartment for the authentic, another for the inauthentic, to which advertising and the power of advertising belong, is perhaps what saves us from some of the forces that were set free in Europe three generations ago. Though not forever, there being an element of the unknown in this, the system always containing something that cannot be said although it is true, and at some point, one might speculate, the power of truth will prevail. In a society without physical hardship, where violence among like kind is regulated, it is hard to imagine that this could happen; never has a society been further from revolution as our own, never has any human population been so comfortably dulled in hygge as our own, but our world too has its downside, the so-called Third World, where structural violence is quite as merciless and destructive as it once was in Europe, and if it were to be set in motion against us, it is by no means certain that the good and the bad, the moral and the immoral, the true and the untrue could be kept apart from each other as they are today.

Hitler's insight was that emotions are always stronger than arguments, and that the power that resides in a we, the yearning and desire for community is unfathomably greater than that which resides in solicitude toward a they. Propaganda directs itself to emotions, not to intellect, which it insults, and some of this same dynamic applies to what he writes about the precedence of the spoken word over the written; the spoken word goes at least potentially directly to feelings and so works from within, since what a person feels always eclipses what they might think, an emotionally based opinion is felt to be exactly what it is, something one knows, as opposed to a rationally based opinion, which is quite differently relative in nature, being open to objective, reasoned argument and thereby capable of being changed by such argument.

The written word complicates, the spoken word simplifies, at least when directed toward moods and emotions, something the written word, or at least the political and argumentative written word, cannot. This is why firstly music and secondly painting are Hitler's preferred art forms; both communicate without words, through emotion. That he understood this, and understood how to exploit it politically, was what set him apart from all other politicians of his day.

When Hitler was appointed Reich chancellor in 1933 and the Nazis assumed power, a shift occurred in public language in a number of respects. It became simpler, the same words repeated over and over again. Victor Klemperer traces this back to Hitler and Mein Kampf, published eight years earlier, which he sees as establishing every characteristic of Nazi language use. With the Nazi takeover in 1933, what previously had been group-speak became the language of the people, a Volkssprache, Klemperer writes, and the significant thing about that shift was that this language took possession of the entire spectrum of German life, its private as well as its public aspects. Politics, the courts, the economy, art, science, school, sport, family, nurseries, the armed forces. The Nazis intervened in everything, and they did so by means of their language. It was simple, uniform, and based on speech. The new technologies such as radio and film turned communication between the one and the all into something that happened in the moment – as opposed to the printed word, which could be read at any time, in any place, and as many times as the reader wished – and meant that the message reached everyone, even those unable or unwilling to read. Klemperer writes of how the Nazis erased the distinction between written and spoken language, turning everything into oration, address, exhortation, invective. There was no difference between the propaganda minister's speeches and tracts, and no longer any divide between public and private. This is what Klemperer describes, the shift that occurs, starting in 1933, not only in the language of the state but also in the language of the individual. The state speaks in the guise of the one, one voice penetrating into the all, and the one among the all soon begins to speak in the manner of the state, becoming its own expression. All newspapers, all magazines, all radio programs, all novels, all poems, all textbooks are colored by this language, which does not stop there, but spreads everywhere and to all.

> I listened to workers while sweeping the streets and working in the machine room: it was always, be it printed or spoken, from the mouths of the educated > *or the uneducated, the same clichés and the same tone. And even in the case of those who were the most persecuted victims and of necessity mortal enemies of National Socialism, even among the Jews, the LTI [lingua tertii imperii] was ubiquitous – in their conversations and letters, even in their books, insofar as they were still able to publish, it reigned supreme, as omnipotent as it was wretched, omnipotent indeed in its very poverty.*

As an assimilated Jew, Klemperer stands from the very first on the outside; what this language does, by building up an enormously strong sense of community, a we that cuts across all political and class distinctions, by embracing the most destitute of vagrants and the wealthiest families of upper-class society within the same overarching whole, which is to say Germany and Germanness, is to exclude Klemperer and the other Jews; the we does not include them, instead it expels them in just as many ways as it includes the others. The Jews become they. Jews with German-sounding forenames are compelled by the state to add a supplementary Jewish name, such as Israel or Sara, so that their Jewishness may be plain in all circumstances, the opposite being introduced for Germans, who are now forbidden to bear Jewish-sounding names. No German child was to be called Lea or Sara. When letters of the alphabet were to be made clear over the telephone, it was no longer permitted to say "D for David" – this was actually banned by the authorities in 1933. Before long, Jews were forced to wear the yellow Star of David with the word Jude in lettering reminiscent of Hebrew. The designation J appears in official documents; Klemperer writes that eventually the full word "Jew" occurs some sixty times in every tiny section of his ration card. They are singled out immediately through language. The name, the badge, the letter. The Germans become correspondingly more German; the names of the newborn shift toward the Germanic. Dieter, Detlev, Uwe, Margit, Ingrid, Uta are among those Klemperer notes in the birth announcements of a Dresden newspaper. Place names too are changed, the Slavic giving way to the more Germanic. In Pomerania 120 Slavic place-names, in Brandenburg 175, in Silesia 2,700, in Gumbinnen 1,146. Street names too are replaced, often with historical references. Klemperer comes across one such in Dresden, Tirmannstrasse, with the explanation underneath: "Magister Nikolaus Tirmann, Mayor, died 1437."

The German, the local and the historic, are cultivated in the language, which with the advent of new technologies and the total state is no longer either local or historic, as can be seen in slogans of the time, the modern and the medieval melting together in "Fallersleben, Site of the Volkswagen Plant" or "Nuremberg, City of the Reich Party Days." The old suffix –gau is added to denote a province, Klemperer writes, harking back to ancient Germanic custom, border regions similarly being dubbed mark, as in Ostmark for Austria and Westmark for the Netherlands, thereby establishing connections to these countries that would later legitimize their invasion and occupation. All these changes are about creating identity. Klemperer stands outside this identity, though not entirely so, being married to an "Aryan" and thereby in principle assimilated, meaning his identity is with neither the we nor the they, and consequently he sees the formation of both clearly. The transformation of identity that the systematic, all-encompassing, all-pervading language of the Nazis establishes and reinforces day by day, week by week, month by month, impacts directly on his life.

In 1933 Klemperer was still a professor at the university. He tells of one of the staff there, Paula von B, an intelligent, good-natured woman "no longer in the first flush of youth," assistant to a professor in the German department. She hailed from an officer's family belonging to the old nobility, and Klemperer finds her obviously liberal and European, "despite the odd wistful reminiscence of the glorious Imperial era," and nothing to suggest that politics is an issue for her. On the day of Hitler's ascent to Reich chancellor he bumps into her in the corridor. Usually so serious, she is now suddenly cheerful with a youthful spring in her step.

"You look radiant!" Klemperer says. "Has something good happened to you?"

"Something very good!" she replies. "Do I really need to explain? I feel ten years younger, no, nineteen: I haven't felt like this since 1914!"

"And you are telling me about it? You can say all this even though you can see, read, and hear how people who used to be close to you are being denounced, how books which you once respected are being condemned, how people are rejecting the very intellectual things that you used to – "

She interrupts him, alarmed, and yet lovingly, he writes:

> My dear Professor, I hadn't expected you to overreact so nervously. You should take a couple of weeks' holiday and not read any newspapers. You are allowing yourself to get upset at this moment, and allowing yourself to be distracted from what really matters by minor embarrassments and blemishes which can scarcely be avoided during periods of such radical change. In no time at all you will judge things quite differently. Can I come and visit the two of you sometime soon?

With that, and a heartfelt "kind regards to your family," she exits through the door "like a bouncy teenager," Klemperer recounts. Over the following months he doesn't see her, until one day she turns up at their place. As a German, she feels it her duty to make an open confession to her friends, she says, while hoping that she could still be considered a friend of theirs.

"Duty as a German is not something you would have said in the past," Klemperer interjects. "What has being German or non-German got to do with highly personal or universal human questions? Or do you want to discuss politics with us?"

"Everything is related to the issue of being German or non-German," she replies, "this is all that matters; you see that's what I, what we all, have either learned from the Führer or rediscovered having forgotten it. He has brought us home again!"

"And why are you telling us this?"

"You must recognize, you must understand that I belong entirely to the Führer, but I don't want you to think that as a result I have renounced my affection toward you."

"And how can these two feelings be reconciled? And what does the Führer say concerning your former boss Walzel, the teacher you admired so much?

And how can you reconcile this with the humanitarianism of Lessing and all the others about whom you had essays written? And how . . . but it's pointless asking any more questions."

In response to each sentence he utters she merely shakes her head and has tears in her eyes.

"No, it really does seem to be pointless," she says, "because everything you are asking is based on reason, and the accompanying feelings stem from bitterness about insignificant details."

"And what are my questions supposed to be based on if not reason? And what is significant?"

"I've told you already: that we've really come home! It's something you have to feel, and you must abandon yourself to your feelings, and you must always focus on the Führer's greatness, rather than on the discomfort you are experiencing at present . . . And our classical writers? I really don't think they are at variance with him in any way, you just have to read them properly, Herder, for example, and in any case they would certainly have been convinced sooner or later!"

"And where does this certainty come from?"

"Where all certainties come from: faith. And if all this doesn't mean anything to you, then – yes, then the Führer is right after all when he comes out against the . . ." Here Klemperer states that she just manages to swallow the word "Jews" before continuing: ". . . against the sterile intelligentsia. Because I believe in him, and I had to tell you that I believe in him."

"Well in that case, Fräulein von B, the best thing is to postpone our friendship and the discussion about faith indefinitely . . ."

He sees her again five years later, in 1938, when opening the door of a bank where everyone inside was standing stiffly erect each with an outstretched arm listening to a voice on the radio proclaiming the annexation of Austria to Germany. She was, he writes, in a state of total ecstasy, her eyes sparkling, not simply standing to attention like all the others, the rigidity of her posture and salute more like a rapturous convulsion. Later, he hears it reported with a chuckle that she is one of the Führer's most devoted followers, though utterly harmless. The first woman, who gave him an apple, was ambivalent with regard to the Nazis, whereas the second, this assistant to Professor Walzel, was a true believer. Both were ordinary people, and both made Nazism possible in their own ways. Klemperer fails to understand them, seeing in Hitler only the yelling monomaniac, in Nazism an untenable constraint upon the human. It is what we see too. Yet clearly others must have seen something radically different which gave them hope and a belief in the future and aroused in them such fervor.

It seems no coincidence that Paula von B should compare the spring days of 1933 with the summer days of 1914, the enthusiasm in Germany for Hitler's coming to power being so reminiscent of the tide of emotion that washed across the land at the outbreak of the war. In his biography of the philosopher Martin Heidegger, Rüdiger Safranski describes the buoyant mood in academia during those months, when even Jews allowed themselves to be carried away. Eugen Rosenstock-Huessy, in a lecture given in 1933, opined that the National Socialist revolution represented Germany striving to realize Hölderlin's vision. And in Kiel, Safranski reports, Felix Jacoby begins a lecture on Horace in the summer of 1933 with the following words:

> As a Jew I find myself in a difficult position. But as a historian I have long learned not to view historical events from a private perspective. I have voted for Adolf Hitler since 1927 and I am happy that in the year of the National Rising I am allowed to lecture on Augustus. Because Augustus is the only figure in world history that may be compared to Adolf Hitler.

This was after the boycott of Jewish businesses that came into effect on April 1 that year, and after the dismissal of Jewish public employees on April 7, Safranski notes. Heidegger, who along with Wittgenstein was among the most prominent and significant philosophers of the century, became a Nazi himself, a fully fledged member of the NSDAP. What he and others saw in National Socialism, and in Hitler, was a political movement that penetrated the membrane of politics, reaching in to the authentic, the deepest seat of all that was human, the locus of emotions, community, truth, and morality, far beyond administration, bureaucracy, and day-to-day pragmatics, and so very much greater. Heidegger had described public life as the antithesis of the authentic in his concept of das Man (often rendered as the "they"), the inauthentic being who expressed the mean, where individual modes were regulated and to a certain extent subsumed by the others. He referred to this as "the dictatorship" of das Man.

> In this inconspicuousness and unascertainability, the real dictatorship of the "they" [das Man] is unfolded. We take pleasure and enjoy ourselves as they take pleasure; we read, see, and judge about literature and art as they see and judge; likewise we shrink back from "the great mass" as they shrink back; we find "shocking" what they find shocking. The "they," which is nothing definite, and which all are, though not as the sum, prescribes the kind of Being of everydayness . . .
> Distantiality, averageness, and leveling down, as ways of Being for the "they," constitute what we know as "publicness." Publicness proximally controls every way in which the world and Dasein get interpreted, and it is always right – not because there is some distinctive and primary relationship-of-Being in which it is related to "Things," or because it avails itself of some transparency on the part of Dasein which it has explicitly appropriated, but because it is insensitive to every difference of level and of genuineness and thus never gets to "the heart of the matter." By publicness everything gets obscured, and what has thus been covered up gets passed off as something familiar and accessible to everybody.

The dictatorship of das Man sanctions and reduces the unique, who become trivialized to such a level as to become amenable to commentary by all, though in a form beyond recognition, radically deconstructed, diluted, and essentially without quality. In mass society, through the mass media that atunes itself to the mean, this happens every day. From such a perspective, the business of politics, whose players pursue their own agendas and lobby according to personal interest, at the same time as leveling down to das Man, allowing nothing to remain unique or unexampled, is the very arena of the inauthentic. Heidegger's existentialism, in which the state of being, in its true and authentic form, is construed as something beyond language, moreover, one must assume, inaccessible to language and rational thought, approaches mysticism, standing at the vedbande, the forest fringe, to use Olav Nygard's expression, which is to say at the fringe of the holy. Our being in the world is something we grasp with our rational minds, but the rational mind comprehends by representation, and the sense of being we grasp this way is thus a simulation. The moods we feel, always a part of us, are another fundamental way in which we relate to the world. We do not know where they come from or what they mean, only that they are always there. They are given to us, as our existence is given to us. In such a system, speech, or logos, is neither language nor reason, Heidegger's Norwegian translator Lars Holm-Hansen writes, but the articulation of what is understandable, that which is possible to understand. Speech is not the same as language, but is the foundation of language. Language is a representation of what is already articulated in speech. Speech also suggests listening, and that we may also refrain from speech. In these instances we are quite beyond the rational. Moods, silence, listening, all that cannot be articulated by language but nonetheless is present in speech, the speech of being. Here, in this extra-rational space, in the realm of our moods and emotions, in the borderland of religion and mystical ecstasy, far, far removed from the newspapers and their self-important political editorials, fashion shows, cabarets, and sporting events, was where Heidegger came together with Nazism. True being against untrue being. The nonlinguistic expression of feelings against linguistic rationality.

Safranski describes the mood as follows:

> There were overwhelming demonstrations of the new community spirit, mass oaths under floodlit cupolas, bonfires on the mountains, and the Führer's speeches on the radio – people would assemble, festively attired, in public places to listen to them, in the great halls of the universities and in taverns. There was choral singing in the churches in honor of the Nazi seizure of power. General-superintendent Otto Dibelius, in his sermon in Saint Nicholas's church on March 21, 1933, the Day of Potsdam, said: "Through north and south, through > east and west, there marches a new will to a German state, a yearning, to quote Trietschke, no longer 'to be deprived of one of the most noble sensations in a man's life,' that of the enthusiastic pride in his own state." The atmosphere of those days is difficult to describe, writes Sebastian Haffner, who experienced it himself. It formed the real power base of the new führer state. "It was – there is no other way of putting it – a widespread feeling of deliverance, of liberation from democracy."

We can gain some sense of this aspect of the Third Reich – the popular demonstrations, the torchlit parades, the songs, the sense of community, all of which were unconditional joys to anyone who participated – by watching Riefenstahl's films of the Nuremberg Rally the following year, 1934, where all these elements are present. The spectacle is staged, but its content far eclipses the fact, because emotions are stronger than all analyses, and here the emotions are set free. This is not politics, but something beyond. And it is something good.

The philosopher Jaspers visited Heidegger in his office in May 1933, describing their meeting as follows, in Safranski's account:

> Heidegger himself seemed to have changed. Straight away on his arrival there arose an atmosphere dividing us. National Socialism had become an intoxication of the people. I went to Heidegger's room to welcome him. "It's just like 1914 . . ." I began, intending to continue: "again this deceptive mass intoxication," but when I saw Heidegger radiantly agreeing with my first words, the rest stuck in my throat . . . Face-to-face with Heidegger himself gripped by that intoxication I failed. I did not tell him that he was on the wrong road. I no longer trusted his transformed nature at all. I felt a threat to myself in view of the violence in which Heidegger now participated.

The yearning for simplicity proved quite as vigorous in Heidegger as in his contemporaries, Hitler and Wittgenstein, but whereas the latter drew a boundary as to what could truthfully be said by means of language, construing this in terms of mathematical quality, Heidegger found his own truth on the other side of that boundary, that which could not be spoken. Speaking in Tübingen on November 30, 1933, Heidegger said the following, once again according to Safranski:

> To be primitive means to stand, from an inner urge and drive, at the point where things begin to be primitive, to be driven by internal forces. Just because the new student is primitive, he has a calling to implement the new demand for knowledge.

In National Socialism, philosophy and politics come together at a point outside the language and beyond the rational, where all complexity ceases, though not all depth. It can be seen as such: the rational and objective, analysis and argument, associated with the written word, moves horizontally, between people, is always external to them, always between them, always in motion, in networks of overwhelming complexity and of such scale as to correct and mold the I, and this to an infinitely greater degree than it may be corrected and molded by the I; whereas emotion and mood, associated with speech, the tangible presence of the one in the face of the other, are vertical in nature, associated with the biological and ultimately with death, but also with all else that is biological and mortal, in ways that cannot be predicated, but merely sensed: we are alone, we are one and one, but in the voice, always concrete, always bound up with a particular human in a particular place, our solitude is overcome, this is the promise it brings with it, and in that voice, in its final consequence, death too is overcome. All flags and banners, symbols and rituals are directed, wordlessly, toward this. A torch burning in darkness can make a soul shiver, the cheer of a crowd send it into transports of elation, and in that instance it is the elation of existing and belonging it recognizes and reacts to. Oh, we all know this, it is the heart beating and the blood rushing, it is life and the world, the rivers, the forests, the plains, the wind in the trees. What can the rational mind do that could ever measure up to this? The difference between a poem and the hundred different analyses of a poem, this is what I am talking about. Or as Hitler said, speaking in Potsdam on March 21, 1933:

> The German, at odds with himself, with deep divisions in his mind, likewise in his will and therefore impotent in action, becomes powerless to direct his own life. He dreams of justice in the stars and loses his footing on earth . . . In the end, then, only the inward road remained open for German men. As a nation of singers, poets, and thinkers, they dreamed of a world in which the others lived, and only when misery and wretchedness dealt them inhuman blows did there perhaps grow up out of art the longing for a new rising, for a new Reich, and therefore for new life.

The language employed by the Nazi state was also directed toward the emotions; what was important in that language was not its lexical meaning, not its analytical and argumentative side, but everything else, that which was said without being said, that which resided in the tone of the language, its voice, in speech. "You are nothing, your people is everything," ran a Nazi slogan of the time, Klemperer notes, and this was the message, directly and indirectly repeated and repeated again. The people, came the cry, Germany, came the cry, we, we, we, everywhere.

Personally I have never felt myself to belong to any we; right from when I was small, I have always felt myself to be on the outside. Not because I have thought myself better, quite the opposite, I have never felt good enough to be a part of any we, never felt like I deserved it. Nor do I have any clear feelings of belonging to a particular place; we were newcomers to Tromøya, where I grew up, and so I had, and still have, no right to say that is where I am from. This feeling of being on the outside was most acute during my time at the gymnas, everyone could see I was not good enough, and my realization of that served merely to reinforce my outsideness, there was something odd about me. Oh, how I tingled with joy when the others let me in, like on the day of our graduation parade, and yet I knew that I did not really belong with them, but on my own. Always, I have had only one friend at a time, never more, never any we. I reconciled myself to this when I was a student, stopped hoping for anything else, tagged along with my brother, played in his band, knowing it was the only reason I was allowed to be in it. The role of the writer saved me; being on my own became legitimate, I was something special, an artist.

This summer I experienced something different for the first time. It was paradoxical, because I was on my own when it happened. Nevertheless, I felt myself suddenly to be a part of a we, and that feeling was so enormous and so good that I wept. At least that was one reason I wept. There were many others, for what I am writing about now is the Utøya massacre, when a Norwegian man only a few years younger than myself went through the woods on that tiny island shooting the young people who were gathered there one by one, sixty-nine lives in all. I wept as I would not have wept had sixty-nine youngsters been killed by a bomb in Baghdad or died in an accident in São Paolo, but the feeling that overcame me was that what had taken place had taken place at home, and this, the feeling that I actually possessed a feeling of home, was something I had never felt before. I wept when I saw the images. I called Mom, I called Linda, I called Geir, who was in Norway. No thoughts or feelings existed for anything other than what had happened. Now and then the full reality of what had taken place on the island, and its consequences, occurred to me in all its horror, but then it would go away again. It seemed all to be engulfed in darkness. It was the darkness of grief, but also the darkness of atrocity, and the darkness of death. But the broadcast images showed light, and I knew that light, it was the light of a Norwegian fjord on a rainy day in July. Indeed, all the images that came out from there were recognizable to me, the dark green of the pine trees that extended down to the water, the white-gray of the rocks, the water itself, heavy and motionless below, also gray. There, amid all that was so familiar to me, lay dead bodies, covered by plastic sheeting. From the land came images of the survivors. Some were lying on the ground receiving treatment, some were boarding buses, some were walking away, wrapped in woolen blankets. Some stood and held each other. Some were calling out, some were crying. These were ordinary Norwegian children. The ambulances were ordinary Norwegian ambulances. The police cars were ordinary Norwegian police cars. And when pictures of the man who had done this, who had gone around the island shooting all these people one by one, appeared in the media, they showed an ordinary Norwegian face with an ordinary Norwegian name. It was a national tragedy, and it was my tragedy too. I felt the need to be there, a powerful urge, for the people, the Norwegian people were gathering in huge, silent demonstrations, hundreds of thousands of people standing in the streets clutching roses in their hands. What I felt was the pull of the we I knew, the pull of belonging, of being a part of what is good and meaningful. More democracy, greater openness, more love. This was what Norwegian politicians said, it was what the Norwegian people said, it was what I said to myself as I sat and wept and watched it on TV, the pull it exerted on the emotions was so strong, so vigorous and strong, and the feelings I felt were real and authentic, they came from the heart; this had happened at home, and those gathering in the streets were my people.

Now that I am removed from them I have difficulty grasping those feelings. They seem false, induced only by the power of suggestion, I knew none of the dead, how could I grieve for them as I did? How could I feel such a strong sense of belonging? And yet the feelings were quite incontestable, and swept everything else aside during the time of the tragedy.

Only afterward did I realize that these must have been the same forces, the enormous forces that reside within the we, that came over the German people in the 1930s. That was how good it must have felt, how secure the identity they were being offered must have appeared to them. The flags and banners, the torches, the demonstrations: that was what it must have been like.

Against this we stood the they of the Jews. The language by which the we was conveyed, and of which it consisted, constitutive of the new identity, may be understood in two ways, as a language invoking grandeur, the emotions that lie beyond the language, having to do with ideals and nearness to the world, but conversely also as an enormous depreciation of the possibilities of language, a violent constraint, a straitening, in which the human itself is rendered mute. Klemperer saw it like this:

> And here a more profound explanation for the impoverishment of the LTI opens up from beneath the obvious one. It was poor not only because everyone was forced to conform to the same pattern, but rather – and indeed more significantly – because in a measure of self-imposed constraint it only ever gave expression to one side of human existence.
> Every language able to assert itself freely fulfills all human needs, it serves reason as well as emotion, it is communication and conversation, soliloquy and prayer, plea, command, and invocation. Regardless of whether a given subject properly belongs in a particular private or public domain – no, that's wrong, the LTI no more drew a distinction between private and public spheres than it did between written and spoken language – everything remains oral and everything remains public. One of their banners contends that "You are nothing, your people is everything." Which means that you are never alone with yourself, never alone with your nearest and dearest, you are always being watched by your own people.

Something is denied a place in the language, on the one side the individual and the unexampled, on the other that which makes complex, which accords subtle differences, the tentative, the uncertain, and the slow, and when everything belonging to this is silenced, no longer finding space in which to articulate itself, it disappears. Whether it disappears only from the language or if what gives rise to it disappears too, ceasing to exist, is perhaps the most burning question of all raised by Nazi rule, pointing as it does toward a problem of identity that is by no means neutral, which is to say of a technical or instrumental nature, but directly tied up with the dreadful shadow cast over humanity by the Holocaust.

No one among us can say what the reason was for the Holocaust, any link between, for example, the brutalization of human minds that occurred in the trenches of World War I, the Völkisch preoccupations of pre-war German culture, the flourishing nationalism of the interwar period, the stock market crash of 1929, inflation and mass unemployment, the growth of racial biology, Hitler's pathological hatred and charisma, Germany's humiliation with the Treaty of Versailles, and the extermination of the Jews is impossible to draw, for the simple reason of not being real. The Holocaust came of society, an occurrence within it, but was something to which society would or could not give name, and which already at that point, as the first trainloads of Jews trundled eastward, was something barely real, taking place at the very margins of humanity, mute and practically invisible to the eye, for if there is one thing shared by the few who witnessed it, it is that they turned away. The silence described by the Polish railway official interviewed in Shoah is telling. That silence was the extermination of the Jews. The sound of the human suddenly ceasing to exist, the stillness that cloaked the landscape in which it had echoed only a moment before. The occasional rush of wind in the trees, a faint hammering in the distance, the sounds of emptiness. How was it possible that so many people, more than a thousand, could fall so silent? Where were they? That stillness is the stillness of the void, descending when what was no longer is, and it is this that makes what took place so impossible to comprehend, for the extermination of the Jews is that which is not. Indeed, it is nothing. How are we to relate to it in any real way? If we select someone to represent it, an individual with a name and history, family and friends, we are addressing it through the fate of the individual, thereby lending it dignity, for the person in question was indeed dignified by virtue of being human, yet it was precisely that human dignity that was absent in the Holocaust, and that absence which made it possible. If we do not select someone to represent it, we are depriving the victims of their names, construing them as the six million, generalizing the atrocity, and thereby falling quite as short, since it was not six million Jews who were exterminated, but one and one and one, six million times. The two perspectives cancel each other out.

Shoah, which not once in its nine-and-a-half-hour entirety abandons its obligation to that problem, resolves it in what is presumably the only way possible, by considering the Holocaust as a contemporary occurrence on the basis that we can only fully relate to those parts of it that still exist around us, to the places as they are now, all but Auschwitz long since gone, and to the recollections or nonrecollections of those who were close to it, as guards, survivors, neighbors, railway officials, bureaucrats, and nothing else, pure present time, of which such recollections are a part. Absence thus becomes the form itself, people talking about what is not, in what is, and the impossibility of this, on every level, is the film's theme. How can we talk about what cannot be talked about? How can we talk about something that escapes designation by language insofar as designation itself makes it something it is not?

The extermination of the Jews took place outside the language, undesignated by any linguistic form, a silent occurrence, and the Jews themselves were outside the language too, banished to their bodies, to the "it," the nameless nothing, which eventually was itself destroyed. One of the most telling scenes in Shoah is the interview with Czeslaw Borowi, who lived next to the railway station in Treblinka during the war, then a young man who saw the trains come every day with their wagonloads of Jews, saw them wait their turn, after a time fully aware of what was going on only a few hundred meters away. As he describes what he saw he suddenly recounts the voices of the Jews from the packed wagons. Ra ra ra ra, he says. Ra ra ra ra. It sounds like animal noise, bird noise. This was their language to him.

Richard Glazar, who was on board one of those trains, in a normal carriage with passenger seats, as if on a holiday trip, recalls that after the station at Treblinka the train moved very slowly, at walking pace, through the forest, it was summer and the weather was hot, and there through the window they saw a boy gesture to them, a slice of his hand across his throat, as if to indicate decapitation. Glazar didn't know what he meant. Two hours later his fellow passengers were ashes. Glazar himself was spared, they needed labor and he survived.

Czeslaw Borowi uses the same gesture during his interview, a slice of his hand across his throat, and likewise, in quick repetition, two brothers who lived on the farm next to the camp and would hear the screams of terror and smell the rotting, burning corpses daily as they plowed the soil and tended their livestock, the smell hanging in the air even kilometers away. It must have been one of these brothers Glazar saw from the train, the gesture, if not directly sadistic then at least full of Schadenfreude, was the only communication that took place between them and the Jews. Ra ra ra ra was the language from the Jews to them, the slice of the hand across the throat was the language from them to the Jews. What is apparent in that particular scene is that those interviewed are oblivious to what they reveal. They are clearly anti-Semites, and although they are among a very small number of witnesses to the extermination, they are ignorant of what this means and display no perspective whatsoever on the dimension of that human disaster. The fact that they put their fathomless ignorance on show in this way is extremely painful to watch, because they do so in all innocence. They simply have no idea.

Quite as powerful is another scene in which some inhabitants of Chelmno are interviewed. Chelmno was where the industrial extermination of human beings first took place. Human beings have been exterminated throughout history, but what occurred in Chelmno represented a qualitatively new step, something that had never occurred before. Those who were to be killed were transported to a castle where they were forced to strip naked before being herded along a corridor onto a ramp and into a truck. The doors were closed, and a tube attached to an exhaust pipe filled the truck with carbon monoxide. When everyone was dead, the truck drove into the forest outside the village. There, the bodies, gathered around the doors they had instinctively tried to prize open, were tipped out onto the ground, and thrown into mass graves. After a time a huge incinerator was set up in the forest and the corpses that had been buried were dug up again and burned, all other bodies from then on simply being incinerated. What was new about this was that it was not a single occurrence, but took place several times a day over a period of two years. Today the castle has been demolished, the incinerators dismantled, and the only thing that remains is some rubble in a clearing.

Dark is the forest, and still. A river runs by below. Here the flames leaped into the sky, Simon Srebnik recalls, a boy of thirteen in 1941, who worked at the incinerator. More trucks were deployed to increase capacity, and after a while the arriving Jews were gathered in the church rather than the run-down castle. It is outside this church that the people of the village are interviewed, Simon Srebnik, whom they all remember, in their midst: he sang for the German soldiers, was almost their mascot, they taught him German songs, and as they stand there gathered around him, the boy now a middle-aged man, it is with the obvious joy of reunion. They recount what happened in detail, the things they saw. How the church behind them was filled with Jews, the vestry piled up with the suitcases they had brought with them, the number of trucks required before the church was emptied. One of them steps forward and recalls a rabbi he heard about at the time who said the Jews were to blame for the death of Jesus, that his blood was upon them, and when the interviewer asks him if he believes it was the Jews' own fault, he replies that he is merely repeating what the rabbi said. More accounts follow, in the same detail, and more villagers congregate in front of the camera, which they stare at with ill-concealed interest and glee, like children. Soon after, a procession comes out of the church and the villagers busy themselves making sure no one gets in the way of the camera, holding the children back so that it can film the procession, a proud tradition of the village. They are oblivious to what they are showing us, have no idea what the camera sees, no grasp of what happened there, it is something they regret, naturally, that much is understood, but nothing of it has sunk in. As all this is taking place, in front of the church where hundreds of thousands of Jews spent their final hours, in the midst of this flock of villagers, stands Simon Srebnik. It is impossible to tell what he is thinking. His face is unfathomable.

Later he says the only thing he wanted when he was tending the incinerators, thirteen years old, was five slices of bread. He had no understanding of what was going on, he was too young, he says, and used to people dying in the ghetto, people dropped dead all the time. When the Germans left, they shot him in the head, but he survived, and in the film he returns for the first time, sitting in a boat on a narrow river singing the old German soldier songs. In another village those now living in the former homes of the Jews are interviewed, one of them proud of her child's education, another saying that the Jewish women stole their men, and one of the men saying that he is pleased the Jews have gone but not that they went the way they did. Most of all they seem simply to be flattered by the attention. All these people were there at the time, from their midst, their local communities, the Jews were collected and taken away, in their districts they were gassed and burned. The interviews took place in the late 1970s and early 1980s. By then some thirty years had passed, and what happened had become an occurrence among other occurrences. The obvious anti-Semitism they display has an element of innocence about it, since they have absolutely no idea what they are revealing of themselves, or rather to whom they are revealing it. It is small-minded, socially inherited, a function of poverty and no education. But is it evil? Were the people evil who appropriated the houses of the Jews and were glad of the improved living standards that came with them? Are they evil, these people who so eagerly swivel round to point to where the suitcases of the Jews were piled up, excited at the prospect of being on television? They know not what they do, for they are innocent. They would not be capable of perpetrating such crimes as they witnessed. The extermination of the Jews organized and carried out by the Germans was qualitatively apart, something other and far greater than popular Jew-baiting.

To organize something of that nature first of all requires an enormous volition; we know what resistance the human being feels to killing its own kind, even for the soldier at war, faced with an armed enemy and in danger of being killed himself, the effort required to overcome that resistance is great, but in this instance we are dealing with unarmed people who never raised a hand against them, even toddlers of two and three years old, boys and girls, young women and men, the elderly and infirm, and over a period of some two years on a scale three times that of the total number of Germans killed in World War I. This is not something that simply happens. It can occur only on the basis of an immense will, since so much human resistance must be overcome in order for it to take place, yet if we look at the sequence of events, how it came about and was carried out, that will seems almost entirely absent, it appears more like something that just happens, wearily and without exertion, something to be gone along with.

The peasants of the Polish village had not understood what had taken place and what it meant. The question is whether we have. For it was not the simple peasants of the Polish village with their uninformed anti-Semitism who exterminated the Jews. It was the Germans, from Berlin, Munich, Dresden, Frankfurt, the big cities of Europe, a modern and in every respect informed society, technologically and culturally among the most advanced, this being true also in Hitler's own generation, only three generations older than ours. We might posit that the circle of individuals governing Germany at the time were barbaric and brutal, ruthless criminals, and indeed they were, but they were but a tiny handful in a population of sixty million, they were in power because they gave expression to what the people wanted, they were their representatives. But restricting the blame to Germany, the suggestion that the cause lay in some degeneration of things German, would be something of a simplification. It was not German but Norwegian police who identified, tracked down, collected, and dispatched the Norwegian men, women and children who were burned to ashes in Auschwitz. And the Norwegian men, women, and children who were burned to ashes there had neighbors, acquaintances, colleagues, and friends. They bowed their heads, they looked away as if it was not happening. So it was in Norway, so it was in Germany, so it was over the entire continent. It was not happening, or only barely so. No one knew what was going on. No one saw. It scarcely happened. And then it was over. Then we realized that what had taken place had not been inconsequential at all, but the opposite, something so extreme and so huge in scale that nothing like it had ever happened before.

How are we to make sense of this? That while it is happening it is scarcely of consequence, since it happens namelessly and imperceptibly, and those who see it do not know what it is they see, whereas afterward, when it has happened, it is understood to be the very end point of humanity, our outermost boundary, something that must never, ever be repeated. How can one and the same event give rise to two such different perspectives? And how can we know what we must never, ever repeat, when we did not even know what was happening when it happened? Why was it seen only when it was over and there was no longer anything left to see? At that point all the people were dead, the barracks bulldozed and the incinerators dismantled, trees planted, and traces removed.

We still don't know who died. They lost their names and became a number, and their names have yet to be reclaimed, they remain a number, six million. I don't know the name of a single person who perished at Chelmno, first gassed to death in a truck, then burned to ashes in an incinerator and scattered into the river there, the remains of those who were not burned, the largest bones being crushed to bonemeal and likewise scattered into the river, all I know is, their number, 400,000. Nor do I know the name of any one of those gassed and incinerated at Treblinka, only their number, 900,000.

But I do know the names of the most important figures in the German Nazi Party. Hitler, Göring, Goebbels, Himmler, Bormann, Hess, Speer, Rosenberg. Not only that, I also know their faces and quite a lot about their lives and what kind of characters they possessed. The imbalance is striking. Hitler is a name known by everyone and triggers associations in us all. The people he exterminated could be exterminated only by expelling them from the language, taking away their names, making them one with their bodies, severing their connections to the social world, which is the human world, in a process of reduction that ended in them becoming nothing, which is to say a number, their status to this day. The power of the name becomes plain if we bring them together. Hitler on one side, six million Jews on the other. Hitler resurrected two million Germans from their graves in Mein Kampf and led them back to Germany, covered with mud and blood, to remind the population of the sacrifice they had made for their sake. If in our minds we resurrect from their graves the six million people who were exterminated under cover of World War II, bring them together on the plains of Poland, and place Hitler in their midst, the true relationship between them becomes apparent, for his name is then but one among millions of names, his voice one among millions of voices, his life one among millions of lives. The nature of this vast multitude changes according to how far away or how close we stand to observe it. If we are far away, looking at it from high above, we see simply a mass of bodies – limbs, heads, eyes, hair, mouths, ears – man as the creature he is, the human being in terms only of its biology and materiality, and this was what made it possible to incinerate those people, and what their incineration moreover revealed, as if it were some new perspective on the human, our worthlessness, our interchangeability, life rising up in a well. Human life as a cluster of mussels clinging to rocks in the sea, human beings as beetles and vermin, man as a shoal of writhing fish brought gasping to the surface in nets. If, however, we stand up close to each individual, so close as to hear each name as it is whispered, to look into each pair of eyes, where the soul of every human is revealed, unique and inalienable, and listen attentively to the story of a day in the life of each and every one of them, a day in the company of loved ones, families, and friends, an ordinary day in an ordinary place, with all its joy and delicacy, envy and curiosity, routines and spontaneity, imagination and boredom, hate and love, then the opposite becomes apparent, the one, not as I, but as the I's necessity. Which is you.

When Simon Srebnik, the thirteen-year-old boy with the beautiful singing voice, who bundled dead bodies into the enormous incinerator so the flames leaped into the sky in the forest gloom, thought about the future he would see two things in his mind's eye. One was five slices of bread, the only thing he wanted. The other was that when all this stopped he would be on his own. That there would not be a single person left on earth but him. So it was that he went about his work beneath the sky, dragging the corpses, singing his delightful songs in the fields, without feeling anything else but that beyond all this, if he survived, nothing would be left. And Richard Glazar recounts the moment they began burning the bodies at Treblinka, it was dark and the forest rose like a wall outside the camp, the flames leaped into the sky, and one of the other Jews who worked there, an opera singer, began to sing, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken us?" That moment, described to Gitta Sereny in Into That Darkness, her book about Treblinka and the camp commandant there, Franz Stangl, and related also to Claude Lanzmann, is not shocking in the way the atrocities themselves are shocking, since they, in all their inconceivable vileness, are perpetrated by "them" and are impossible to entertain as belonging within the realm of one's own capabilities, for which reason we refer to them as evil; no, that moment shocks in a different way entirely, since in its very monumentality, its invocation of God, and, in that, its overwhelming beauty, it betrays our human truth in favor of divine truth.

In that moment, God dies. Not because he has abandoned them, but because the divine belongs to the very perspective that made the Holocaust possible.

As I write about the Holocaust I sense its unmentionable nature. It feels as if there exists some right of ownership to it that means not just anyone can write about it, one has to have earned the right in some way, either by having lived through it or by writing about it in a manner that is morally binding and unambivalent. To write about the Holocaust one has to be irreproachable, only then is it possible. One's motives have to be unselfish, uncommercial, unspeculative, good and decent. A writer can say what he or she wants about God in a novel, it may be condemned as blasphemous, but not in all seriousness, for the moral indignation entailed by blasphemous violation no longer exists. But when it comes to the Holocaust the writer certainly cannot say what he or she wants, indeed it is the only phenomenon in our society to which the notion of blasphemy remains applicable, in the sense that the indignation brought about by any violation is unanimous and fierce. There lies the boundary. But what kind of boundary is it? Why is it there and not somewhere else? And why is it so fragile?

When we condemn any joking about the Holocaust with such moral force it is because we are defending and protecting something, a value we consider to be inviolable. But what is it exactly that we are protecting in this case? What do we achieve by making that event so invulnerable? What value exactly are we talking about? The British historian David Irving was sent to prison for claiming the gas chambers did not exist. This is an opinion, not an action. What other opinions can we be sent to prison for expressing? Not many, certainly. In fact, I can't think of any.

The Holocaust has taken on all the characteristics of a taboo. The taboo is society's way of protecting itself against undesirable forces. It is a way of making them plain by negation, fencing them in by a not, thereby turning them into something that exists outside our daily lives, outside the zone in which normal life, by virtue of its very existence within the field of the normal, unfolds in a continuous flow of possibility. What is particular about the Holocaust is the opposite of what we have made it. What is particular about the Holocaust is that it was trivial, proximate, and local. The Holocaust was families being singled out and made to assemble. It was trains leaving the ghettos in Poland, Germany, the Netherlands, Belgium, Greece, Czechoslovakia, Lithuania, Latvia – all countries under Nazi control – trundling through Europe, coming to a halt at tiny stations outside Polish villages, Treblinka, Sobibor, Auschwitz, Belzec, where those inside were bundled out if they came from the east or instructed to alight if they came from the west. The places they arrived at were what they believed to be relocation camps or work camps. Here they were segregated, women and children to the right, men to the left, made to strip naked, then led through a corridor into a chamber where they were gassed to death, their bodies removed and incinerated or buried. These camps were small, Treblinka was six hundred by four hundred meters in area, and those who worked there were relatively few, a hundred and fifty Ukrainian soldiers, fifty German SS. Treblinka moreover housed a thousand so-called work Jews who carried out hard labor, before they too were gassed and incinerated. On any normal day in what Glazar refers to as the peak periods ten thousand Jews would arrive at the camp by train. Hours later their bodies were gone. This industrial destruction went on for two years. In that time somewhere between 800,000 and 1,200,000 people were murdered there. No human being is capable of grasping this figure and the events it represents. Yet at the same time it was commonplace, a routine, what they referred to themselves as production, though production of death. The production of death at Treblinka was primitive compared to what took place at Birkenau, according to Franz Suchomel, an SS soldier assigned to the camp.

What I am trying to say is that all this was real. And in being real, it was tangible. And in being tangible, it was local. And that it was incorporated into the realm of the normal. So wholly incorporated, in fact, that it could take place and scarcely be noticed. All horror converges on this. The first people to be gassed to death in the Third Reich were not Jews, but people with mental and physical disabilities. They called it euthanasia and it was an extension of legislation passed in 1933 sanctioning the sterilization of people with serious hereditary illness. According to Sereny, the Nazis commissioned an opinion from a professor of moral theology at the Catholic university in Paderborn, Joseph Mayer, seeking support before implementing this "merciful" program. Mayer's hundred-page report firstly provided an historical review, then moved on to discuss the pros and cons, before proceeding to cite the Jesuit moral system of probability:

> there are few moral decisions which from the outset are unequivocally good or bad. Most moral decisions are dubious. In cases of such dubious decisions, if there are reasonable grounds and reasonable "authorities" in support of personal opinion, then such personal opinion can become decisive even if there are other "reasonable" grounds and "authorities" opposing it.

On which basis Mayer concluded that euthanasia was justifiable, as there were reasonable grounds and authorities both for and against. The report, which according to Sereny was found in five copies only, has never come to light, does not exist; like almost everything else to do with this it has either been destroyed or is merely rumor, initiated with the purpose of legitimizing or whitewashing something incriminating. The silence surrounding these murders and their administration is near total. But the euthanasia program was effectuated, more than a hundred thousand people were exterminated. It was about racial purity and was founded on science and law, it began with sterilization and continued with the gassing of people so badly afflicted and helpless it can be assumed it was seen as a blessing to themselves and those who cared for them.

In Mein Kampf the Jewish question exists in principle within the same sphere, racial purity versus racial impurity, the control of the state over the biological body, racial hygiene, and public health, but whereas sterilization and euthanasia were within the bounds of the law and what the authorities and ordinary people found acceptable, albeit controversial, the matter of wiping out an entire people was of course utterly unprecedented and quite as unthinkable. When the decision to exterminate the Jews was taken, probably somewhere toward the close of 1941, almost certainly in the form of a spoken order given by Hitler to Himmler, and the first death camps were set up that winter, most of the central figures involved were drafted in from the euthanasia program. Killing people on that scale had never been done before, there was no precedent, nothing to refer back to other than the gas chambers of the euthanasia program, and these were accordingly taken as the blueprint. The murders of Jews on the Eastern Front, which were pure executions, not only of men but of women and children too, were too costly in terms of time and personnel and would have been impracticable. What they were looking at was a question: how to kill as many people as possible, in as short a time as possible, using as few human resources as possible? Much trial and error was involved before the system became effective. No budget existed, the whole endeavor financed by the confiscation of the personal assets of the victims. An ordinary travel agency took care of the practicalities of chartering trains in exactly the same way as they dealt with such matters normally. Ordinary railway staff were deployed to organize the logistics of the transports, plotting train times into the schedules, passing information on through the system. The camps were built, personnel received their orders, the industry began. Some of the soldiers must have been picked out on account of their brutality, many being obvious sadists who could find outlets and indulge themselves here, while others were ordinary and, in any other context, considerate men doing a job.

Two years later they tried to remove all traces; having demolished Treblinka's every structure they built a farm on the site and instructed the Ukrainian family they installed in it to say they had lived there always. The same occurred in Sobibor, Belzec, and Chelmno, all traces gone. All around, life went on as if nothing had happened.

What had happened?

I think it would be correct to say that what happened was not inhuman at all, but human, and that this is what makes it so terrible and so closely bound up with our own selves and our human lives that in order to see it, and thereby take command of it, we must remove it and place it beyond ourselves, outside the boundaries of the human, where it now stands, sacrosanct and inviolable, mentionable only in certain, meticulously controlled ways. But it began in a we, and came together in an I, who concentrated its essence into a book, from where it swelled into the social sphere, unfathomably silent in its seeping pervasion, thought morphing into action, a tangible, physical presence in the world we inhabit, questioned by none of those involved, but carried out and done.

Train after train, transport after transport, human being after human being.

During these past weeks writing about Mein Kampf I have been contemplating what I know about evil. Before I started I never gave it a thought, it was an issue belonging to my teenage years, my Bjørneboe period, when I felt personally reponsible for all humanity. The question of the possible existence of God belonged to the same period. I still remember a page from my diary when I was sixteen, starting with the question "Does a God exist?" and ending in the conclusion that it did not. Now I am forty-two and back at the start. I am no longer the same person; what for so long seemed so near, my teenage years, exist now on the other side of a vast ocean of time. And what I related to then only instinctively or emotionally, the social world, whose power I felt whenever my cheeks burned with shame or I was consumed by self-reproach because of something I had done that made me feel so inadequate, so awkward, so indistinct, so totally stupid and foolish, but also unprincipled and dishonest and fraudulent, I now see more clearly, not least after having written these books, which in their every sentence have tried to transcend the social world by conveying the innermost thoughts and innermost feelings of my most private self, my own internal life, but also by describing the private sphere of my family as it exists behind the façade all families set up against the social world, doing so in a public form, a novel.

The forces that exist within the realm of the social reveal themselves only when they are exceeded, and they are powerful indeed, almost, no, absolutely impossible to break away from. I imagined I was going to write exactly what I thought and believed and felt, in other words to be honest, this is how it is, the truth of the I, but it turned out to be so incompatible with the truth of the we, or this is how it is meant to be, that it foundered after only a few short sentences. I came to understand what morality is, and where it is found. Morality is the we within the I, which is to say a concept of the social world, and it stands above the truth. The "ought" of morality is the voice of decency that saves us. But it is also the voice of I-constraint, the antithesis of truth and freedom, the voice that stands in our way. It is this latter dimension to which Heidegger alludes with das Man, the dictatorship of the we, the tyranny of the mean, the middle-class mind-set that transforms everything into its own image. That he failed to see through Hitler, so petty bourgeois in everything he did and thought, and Nazism, which was the revolution of the petty bourgeoisie, but was instead duped by their symbols of greatness and constructs of authenticity, unseeing of the fact that greatness and authenticity were the same as death, is astonishing. When Jaspers asked him how such an uneducated man as Hitler could ever govern the country, Heidegger replied infatuatedly, Education doesn't matter at all, just look at his wonderful hands! Only decency could have saved him, as with all others who followed Hitler. Jaspers was saved by decency, Jünger and Mann likewise. But not Heidegger. And certainly not Franz Stangl, the commandant of Treblinka. To him, decency was remaining at one's post and making sure ten thousand people were gassed to death and incinerated every day, ensuring the system ran smoothly and without backlogs. How treasonable the social world could be, and how powerful its forces, revealed itself in Stangl as it did in nearly all other Germans under the Nazi regime. Had he possessed the strength to break the bonds imposed on him by the social world, he would never have found himself in the diabolical madness in which he stood, would never have had the lives of 900,000 people on his conscience. In the Third Reich the voice of human conscience did not say it is wrong to kill, it said it is wrong not to kill, as Hannah Arendt so precisely observes. This was made possible by a shift in the language, displayed in its purest form in Mein Kampf, which contains no "you," only an "I," and a "we," which is what makes it possible to turn "they" into "it." In "you" was decency. In "it" was evil.

But it was "we" who carried it out.

To protect ourselves we use the most potent marker of distance we know, the line of demarcation that passes between "we" and "they." The Nazis have become our great "they." In their demonic and monstrous evil, "they" exterminated the Jews and set the world aflame. Hitler, Goebbels, Göring and Himmler, Mengele, Stangl, and Eichmann. The German people who followed "them" are in our minds also a "they," a faceless and frenzied mass, almost as monstrous as their leaders. The remoteness of "they" is vast and dashes down these proximate historical events, which took place in the present of our grandparents, into a near-medieval abyss. At the same time we know, every one of us knows, even though we might not acknowledge it, that we ourselves, had we been a part of that time and place and not of this, would in all probability have marched beneath the banners of Nazism. In Germany in 1938 Nazism was the consensus, it was what was right, and who would dare to speak against what is right? The great majority of us believe the same as everyone else, do the same as everyone else, and this is so because the "we" and the "all" are what decide the norms, rules, and morals of a society. Now that Nazism has become "they," it is easy to distance ourselves from it, but this was not the case when Nazism was "we." If we are to understand what happened and how it was possible, we must understand this first. And we must understand too that Nazism in its various elements was not monstrous in itself, by which I mean that it did not arise as something obviously monstrous and evil, separate from all else in the current of society, but was on the contrary part of that current. The gas chambers were not a German invention, but were conceived by Americans who realized that people could be put to death by placing them in a chamber infused with poisonous gas, a procedure they carried out for the first time in 1919. Paranoid anti-

Semitism was not a German phenomenon either, the world's most celebrated and passionate anti-Semite in 1925 being not Adolf Hitler but Henry Ford. And racial biology was not an abject, shameful discipline pursued at the bottom of society or its shabby periphery, it was the scientific state of the art, much as genetics is today, haloed by the light of the future and all its hope. Decent humans distanced themselves from all of this, but they were few, and this fact demands our consideration, for who are we going to be when our decency is put to the test? Will we have the courage to speak against what everyone else believes, our friends, neighbors, and colleagues, to insist that we are decent and they are not? Great is the power of the we, almost inescapable its bonds, and the only thing we can really do is to hope our we is a good we. Because if evil comes it will not come as "they," in the guise of the unfamiliar that we might turn away without effort, it will come as "we." It will come as what is right.

Reading texts written in the decades leading up to World War II is like reading the legislation of a former society whose laws no longer apply. The ideas expressed make up a system which in itself is comprehensible and meaningful but which is no longer connected to any practical reality. The notions of what constitutes a human being, what constitutes a society, and what is most important in our human life are inapplicable to the society in which we live today. No student of any high school today would lay down his life for his country, no twenty-five-year-old today would find any value at all in the deaths of two million people. The phenomenon is simply inconceivable, other than as an abnormality. Anyone today who suggested democracy was an expression of decay, liberalism a disgrace, would be hung out to dry in all our media. Antidemocratic sentiment is a taboo in the original sense, something society eems cannot be touched on. When it is approached, it is approached in ways that shield us from its content, much like the rituals of primitive societies, in this case by the texts of the era being accorded a particular status where, in the same way as the holy excludes that which is unholy, all but their purely textual properties are ignored. In this way we are able to approach notions like divine violence, central to an essay written by Walter Benjamin in 1921, which, because he is one of the most recognized thinkers of the Weimar period, perhaps of all modernity, must be rescued from its antidemocratic implications, and we may also investigate ideas concerning the arbitrariness of law without lending them any significance other than that which they command in the internal world of the text, whose propositions go back to Antiquity, to Plato, Aristotle, or even to the Presocratics, as far forward as to Nietzsche, back to the Romans and Roman law, further to Heidegger, back to Augustine and Thomas Aquinas, on to Benjamin, back to Descartes, and all the way up to Kierkegaard, but never at any point reaching into our time and our society, never in any binding sense, for the insights gained in such texts find no consequence in the reality outside them. The problems they raise are addressed and aired, but their validity is restricted to their own delimited context, exactly as rituals once addressed the chasms within their own societies. The best example is Nietzsche, one of the most influential figures in the field of the humanities, referred to in almost every discussion of society and culture, yet the reassessment of values that takes place in his philosophy, which absorbs and fascinates generation after generation of students, never genuinely impacts in the sense of any obligation being established between the texts and the present-day reality of the reader. All thoughts in this respect, relating to the undemocratic, to qualitative differences between human beings, to the nihilistic, to the amoral, and to the arbitrariness of law, are treated as text, and any fascination or relevance made a matter of internal fascination or relevance.

This distance between the text and the world emerges in exemplary fashion in an essay by Girard in which Hamlet is construed as a drama dealing with Hamlet's attempts to put an end to vengeance, which is the fundamental trope of mimetic violence. Hence the postponements, the doubt, the hesitation, the lack of initiative, the impotence. In this essay Girard disqualifies almost all previous interpretations, such disqualification eventually becoming a point in itself as he considers how so many scholars of literature, so many professors over the past hundred years and more, could have construed Hamlet's reluctance to avenge his father as a failure, an expression of faltering will and faltering ability, even going so far as to pathologize Hamlet's resistance to such an act. When these texts on Hamlet are read a thousand years from now, in another culture, their readers will surely think that professors and other scholars of literature were a bloodthirsty and vengeful lot. Hamlet is a portrayal of a human being, professors and other scholars of literature are human beings too, yet this identification is never touched on, the connection is simply never made, for the morals and ethics of Hamlet are morals and ethics applying within the text or system of texts, not to the human beings who read those texts in their own lives. The question professors and other scholars of literature ought to ask themselves in order to understand Hamlet is this: What would I have done if my father died and I suspected someone of killing him? Would I have gone to the person I thought had killed him, who it turned out was my uncle, and avenge my father's death by killing him? No, nobody would, to do so would be quite atrocious, a deeply archaic and absolutely immoral act. What we would do would be to go to the police and allow the law to preside. This is Hamlet's dilemma, Girard tells us, he is one of us, a so-called modern man caught up in an archaic system of vengeance and violence. To his mind this system is not anchored in anything absolute, it is arbitrary, and if it is arbitrary it is also a game, and if it is a game then indeed everything else is a game too, the social world is nothing but counters on a board which may be moved in one direction if this set of rules applies or in another if another set of rules applies. Such arbitrariness only becomes clear the moment we step outside the system, or when the system goes from following one set of rules to following another. Both before and after such a transfer, the social world and the system of rules are one and the same, difficult to separate, as if the rules are not applied but come from within, from the social world itself, like nature, with the same conditions as exist between the laws of nature and natural matter.

The question of what I would have done and thought had I been Hamlet is one of identification, and identification concerns likeness. In an essay about Rembrandt, Jean Genet describes a train journey he once made and how he was seated in a carriage opposite a particularly loathsome man with bad teeth, who smelled awful and spat tobacco on the floor, and how all of a sudden it came to Genet, out of nothing and with the force of every revolutionary idea, that all men were of equal worth. This is an idea that is more than familiar to us, and we are brought up to believe it to be right, but what Genet describes is the abrupt insight into what it actually entails, its utterly wild radicality. Was this wretched and despicable person on the seat opposite equal to him? Are you equal to me? It is an impossible thought. Genet stares at him and their eyes meet. What he sees in the man's eyes, what reveals itself to him there, in that fleeting moment, makes him wonder if there is something in our identity, far within its depths, that is absolutely the same. In other words absolute identity. Genet does not link this idea in any way to Rembrandt, but it is rooted in Rembrandt's paintings, and this I know to be true; I saw a self-portrait by Rembrandt in a London gallery, and the powerful sense of nearness in its gaze, as if risen through the four hundred years that have passed since it was painted, now to meet our own, told me exactly what Genet was talking about. While I have never put it into words, I have nonetheless felt its truth.

I am you.

This has nothing to do with the social we, for only the unique I can express it, and all art, in conveying and communicating what is shared within a culture, concerns this. Any art that expresses only the social we is art that becomes isolated by time, a hundred years later it is the expression only of its era, of what was going on in the social world at that particular time and nothing else. This social we was what Nazism destroyed, and what Paul Celan's poem is a response to. "Engführung" is the end of what began with Hitler's Mein Kampf, written in the remains of the language the Nazis destroyed, not with the intention primarily of displaying that destruction, though in 1959 that must also have been important, but to forge a new path from language into reality. To do so, Celan went to the most basic components of the language, its very foundation, which is I, you, we, they, it – and is, was. Against the void of death and absence they discharge new meaning, which is unexampled, which is to say inimitable, valid only here, in this single poem. The boundary of meaning is also the boundary of community, and to that place only the one may go. So far does the poem reach into the idiosyncratic that no name can be mentioned, the name being a superordination, something general, unaffected by time, always the same, and yet steeped in time, whose associations flow steadily through it. Thus Celan approaches the it of the I, though not in the form of the body's namelessness, not in the form of the silence of biology, but that part of the human self which is the same in all of us. The poem's archaic feel, the historic events addressed as something outside the name, which is to say in the undifferentiated, which is always the same, or borders on sameness, comes from this. In a strange though absolutely significant way, the namelessness of the Jews who were executed in World War II seems at variance with the namelessness within the poem, which is not in any way bound to the body, not deadlocked by silence, but on the contrary seeks to give the silence that is the relationship between the nothing and the all, between the linguistic conception of the world and the world itself, a voice. That voice is the voice of the one, and it is the voice of the all. It is I, it is you, it is we, it is they, it is it, and it is time, flowing through it all.

I am you.

Jesus said, Your neighbor is like you. The consequence of that idea, so wildly radical, is that Hitler is worth as much as the Jews he ordered to be unprecedentedly to death and incinerated. Genet said, Your neighbor is you. From this too there is no exception, not even in the case of someone such as Adolf Hitler. We are opposed, and rightly so, to everything he stood for. Hitler is our antithesis. But only in respect to what he did, not in terms of the person he was. In that, he was like us. Hitler's youth resembles my own, his remote infatuation, his desperate desire to be someone, to rise above the self, his love for his mother, his hatred of his father, his use of art as a space of great emotions in which the I could be erased. His problems forming relationships with others, his elevation of women and his anxiety in their company, his chastity, his yearning for purity. When I watch him on film, he awakens the same feelings in me as my father once did. In that too there is likeness. He represented conservative middle-classness in so many respects, and this too I know, it is the voice, trembling with indignation, that says you are not good enough. He also represents the defiance of conservative middle-class values, the young lad sleeping until midmorning, refusing to look for a job, wishing instead to write or paint, because he is something more and better than the others. He was the one who opened a we and said you are one of us, and he was the one who closed a we and said you are one of them. But above all he was the man who emerged from the bunker, with the world in flames and millions of people dead as a result of his volition, to greet a line of young boys, his hands shaking from sickness, and there, in a fleeting gleam of his eyes, revealed something warm and kind, his soul. He was a small person, but so are we all. He must not be judged for what he was, but for what he did. What he did, however, he did not do alone. It was done by a we, that we was put under pressure, it gave way and something collapsed. Only those who were strong enough in themselves could withstand it. They were the self-willed and the disloyal, who refused the ideology, which is the community's idea of how the world should be. Paul Celan's poem is a nonideological poem, expressing the antipode of ideologies. Even a name is expressive of ideology, an idea of a person, at the same time as it is that idea that saves a person from extinction within the mass: the name is the one. Hitler made his name the all, emptying from it any semblance of individuality, as Hess once said, You are Germany. After the Holocaust his name remained, his face endured, whereas the six million Jews who perished remained nameless, faceless nobodies. This too is a theme of Paul Celan's poem. A story ended there, in that zero point, in that oblivion, desolate and forsaken, all that is human obliterated, worthless. Another story began there, our story. Who covered it up, Celan asks in "Engführung," who concealed the uniquely and authentically human of this catastrophe in the general, emblematic, and common language if it had not broken down?

A story ended there, but it was not a story of evil. The time from the beginning of the twentieth century to the end of World War II was a period when the fundamental building blocks of our human existence and organizational structures were in flux, not to say disintegrating, and the unprecedented radicality of those fifty years, which gave rise to the last two great utopian movements, Nazism and Communism, can only be understood on the basis that the societal order suddenly, because of a massive buildup of pressure arising in industrialism's changes – in time, extremely compressed while in volume expansive, no longer could be taken for granted, it began to crack and appeared increasingly arbitrary, governed by rules imposed from without, in a civilizational system at odds with its people, from which they, or many of them, felt utterly alienated. Those who experienced this strove toward a new foundation, a new society, and since this was not self-evident the way democracy and liberalism are self-evident to us, they endeavored to find it in what presented itself as such in the realm of the human, in other words the absolute. The core, the essence, the authentic.

Our society and culture, which not only surround me on all sides as I sit here in a room inside an apartment in the city of Malmö in southern Sweden, listening to Iron & Wine in the early morning, alone, with Linda and the children vacationing in Corsica, but also pervade me completely, as they pervade my language and pervade my thoughts, shaping my instincts and ideas, setting my boundaries as to what may or may not be done and thought, in short, all that which comprises my particular self, and which also connects me to all other selves, were founded in two crises of massive upheaval, two periods of extremely compressed structural transformations within our human existence, the first occurring with the advent of the scientific revolution in the sixteenth century, the second with the advent of industrialism in the mid-nineteenth century, which sent the world spiraling into fifty years of chaos culminating in the fall of Hitler's Germany in 1945. The human world exists not as an abstract, but in the sum of individual human beings, and it was there, in every single one of them, that the transition from the religious to the secularized occurred from the sixteenth century onward, which is to say in the self, in the I's understanding of itself in relation to the it, the we, and the they.

In the fourteenth century it was impossible for any person to dissect a human corpse in order to see what it looked like inside, the way the internal organs functioned and were ordered. This was so not because it was forbidden in the sense of being punishable by law, what made it impossible was not the fear of reprisal but the fact that it was quite simply unthinkable. In the fifteenth century Leonardo was dissecting corpses and meticulously drawing what he saw, by then it was possible, albeit only to a certain extent; he cut up his bodies in the night, in secret, alone with the dead, but for him the boundary could be exceeded. Today dissecting corpses has not only become institutionalized, it comprises one of the most important foundations of our medical science, and is an absolutely uncontroversial practice.

This is the case because the idea of what we are has changed, and with it the idea of what we can and must do. That change is not instrumental, although the practices that come with it are that too; as Latour writes, there is no such thing as science, only scientists, fragile and small in themselves, shuffling about in laboratories in their slippers, with their freezers and microscopes, their test tubes and computers, drinking coffee with their colleagues, going home after work and wondering whether to barbecue or if the clouds above the hills mean it's going to rain. That this is so means "science" is something that cannot be localized without violating that singularity, but which at the same time obviously exists, as the sum of activities performed by scientists.

Here, in the transition between the one and the all, resides the problem of our time. On the one hand, we live in a society in which a whole set of evaluations in one way or another deemed threatening to the status quo and associated with violence, revolution, and utopia are treated as taboo in the sense that they may only occur in contexts of ritual, moored only figuratively in reality; on the other hand, we live in a society that is changing in ways we cannot consider to be anything but revolutionary, along lines of flight that are directly connected with those taboos, which then are of such form and nature as to preclude that connection. We can talk about the one thing, but only as something outside ourselves, inside a closed system; the other, happening in our midst, is hard for us to see, since the correspondence between those events and our understanding of ourselves is so great, and the door of the external perspective closed.

In practice this means we live in a society which on the one hand has made the utopian and the revolutionary impossible, and which moreover resists any real change to its system on the basis that it is as good as it can get, certainly better by far than the alternatives, all of which degenerated into systems of escalating inhumanity and ended in disaster, but which on the other hand renews itself so swiftly and with such radicality as to be essentially revolutionary, leading directly toward the utopian, construed as the next place. That passage occurs as if in secret, because it is fundamentally undemocratic, for although it affects every one of us, the decisions made along the way are made by the individual. The individual is neither a utopian, nor a revolutionary, nor an antidemocrat, but a devoted democrat and citizen of society, and if there is any trace of revolt in him or her, any suggestion of an urge toward societal change, it is directed toward the distribution of wealth, which at any time is either more or less fair. Together and in this way we venture into still new areas, some so new to us as to require new legislation, not to prohibit or exclude such advances, but to include them in the existing order. We have cloned animals, we have mapped the human genome and are able to modify its genes, we have transplanted hearts and lungs, we have created children outside the womb, and we have even created new species, creatures without origin with properties we alone have decided.

To us these appear to be minor matters in that the industry that has brought them about is made up of small units in which the rest of society is uninvolved, but also because after Nazism and the genocide of the Jews we have suspended the validity of the grand scale, consistently avoiding points at which several values converge into a single trope, such as the idea of the genius, the idea of the sublime, the idea of the divine, the idea of the chosen people, in a construal of the world that leaves no room for a concept such as veneration, this sounding too hollow, or, even more hollow, veneration for the human; this is rhetoric, we consider, it refers to something bigger than us, a trope that with Nazism showed itself to be destructive.

The consequence of this is that there is no longer anything bigger than ourselves, no longer anything to die for, and therefore no longer anything at which to stop in veneration. But to clone an animal, to manipulate human DNA, to create a new creature, is no minor matter. To split the atom is no minor matter. It is to exceed a boundary never before exceeded, it is to intervene in the very constituents of life, though we are ignorant of its origins and have always through all time considered it to be a gift and a mystery, something inviolable. That mystery is not solved by our manipulations, but its boundary is violated. The inviolability of individual life is the very foundation on which we build our society. What does it mean to violate an individual life? It means to kill it, to abuse it, to steal from it, to rape it, to torture it, to victimize it. To act against it in a manner contrary to its own wishes. That boundary is something we protect by means of the bonds that tie together the social world, and if those bonds are broken and the boundary exceeded, we impose sanctions.

But who protects the inviolability of human life when understood not in terms of the individual, but in terms of the collective life, the all? Previously it was religion and the laws of religion. But what about now, with religion gone? The state? The state is an instrumental entity, a more or less pragmatic steering mechanism of the community, whose success is largely measured in terms of gross national product and rates of unemployment, and because science is instrumental too, and its pushing back of the boundaries profitable, there is little motivation for the state to legislate to the effect that life be held sacred and that its boundaries remain unviolated.

We have gone beyond the absolute, for it led us to unprecedented atrocities, but without the absolute everything is relative, a matter of good or poor argument, negotiable, within the domain of reason. Reason is to us the same as profitability. What happens to that which is outside reason? In a world governed by profitability, lack of profitability has no bearing, and the absolute is that which is not exchangeable, neither in money nor in arguments.

The absolute is neither reasoned nor unreasoned, it is what exists outside categories. The absolute may be reached only by the emotions. The absolute belongs to religion, mythology, and the irrational. The absolute is what propels someone to die for a cause greater than himself, faith in the absolute was once the foundation of law. The absolute is death, emptiness, nothingness, darkness. The absolute is the background against which life is lived.

The absolute is eternity. The relative is day-to-day existence. These are the two fundamental tropes of our lives. We hold the absolute at bay, firstly by leveling down the bigness of our existence, that which has to do with the very boundaries of life and materiality, to the commonplace, addressing the issues that concern us all, the great collective, mankind, only in the quotidian; secondly by ritualizing the absolute in an unreal world of images: death is to us not the physical death of the body, but the figurative death, as it occurs in images, in the same way as violence is not physical violence, but figurative violence. Heroism is no longer a possibility, there being no arena for it, those arenas have all been shut down, for the heroic belongs to the bigness we do what we can to shun, yet in the world of images, which any one of us may enter at any time, the heroic lives on: entire worlds and societies have emerged in Internet gaming, where anyone can pick up a machine gun and venture out into the world to shoot the enemy for a few hours. Practically all the films we watch are about exactly this: heroism, violence, death. And the people we watch carry out these heroic deeds in our name, in our place, are all physically beautiful or charismatic, or both. Indeed, that world, growing and expanding with every year that passes, celebrates all the worlds we otherwise reject. Outer beauty, charisma, heroism, violence, and death are not relative, they belong to the pure, the unambivalent, the simple. Our need for this, to see the magnification of our existence and what borders the absolute, is insatiable.

But since the two systems, relativized reality and absolutized pseudo-reality, are mutually exclusive and can exist only separately, the question is what happens if they are measured against each other, if a person not simply applies the yardstick of the absolute to relative reality, but moreover acts on that basis. This is what happened in Norway this summer, when a man only a few years younger than me went out to an island and began indiscriminately shooting and killing young people. He acted like a figure in a computer game, but the act of heroism he thought he was performing, and the carnage he brought about, did not belong to the world of images, was not abstract and without consequence, did not occur in some other place, detached from the time and place of his physical body; it was real, tangible, absolute. Every shot he fired lodged in human flesh, every eye that closed was a real eye belonging to a human being with a real life. Only remoteness can make such an act possible, since in remoteness consequence ceases to exist, and the question we must ask ourselves is not what kind of political opinions this person held, nor if he was mad, but more simply how such remoteness could ever arise in our culture. Did he feel a yearning for reality, for an end to relativity, for the consequences of the absolute? We must assume he did. Do I feel such a yearning? Yes, I do. My basic feeling is that of the world disappearing, that our lives are being filled with images of the world, and that these images are inserting themselves between us and the world, making the world around us lighter and lighter and less and less binding. We are trying to detach ourselves from everything that ties us to physical reality; from the bloodless, vacuum-packed steaks in the refrigerated counters of our supermarkets, the industrially produced meat of cooped-up animals, to society's concealment of physical death and illness, from the cosmetically rectified uniformity of female faces to the endless flow of news images that pass through us every day and which together, in sum, erase all differences and establish a kind of universal sameness, not only because everything is conveyed in the same language, but also because what thereby is so incessantly conveyed inexorably, albeit gradually, recreates what is conveyed in its own image. The symbol of this trend is money, which converts everything into monetary value, which is to say numbers. Everything we have is mass-produced, everything is the same, and our entire world, which is commercial in nature, is based on that serial system. The values in our sky of images are Nazi values, though everyone says differently. Beautiful bodies, beautiful faces, healthy bodies, healthy faces, perfect bodies, perfect faces, heroic people, heroic deaths, the same images prevalent during Nazism, the only difference between theirs and ours being that we refrain from letting them loose on reality, but keep them there, in the domain of the unbinding, and say it is not the value of the image that counts, but the value of the human, which is different. Yet the gap between them is so vast, and the rush of the authentic, which here is fictitious, so compelling, that someone sooner or later is bound to bring the sky down to earth and let it apply here. The perpetrator of the Utøya massacre did so, unbound by any relationship to reality, to the physical bodies he killed, but bound to the image of reality, in which no real consequence exists. In the days following that horrific event a story came out about a boy who had swiveled to face the killer, who in turn had looked into his eyes and told him he was unable to shoot him. And he did not. He shot everyone else he could, with this one exception. Why? Because he saw his eyes, and in doing so his actions became binding. A similar story, reported by Liljegren, exists from Hitler's life. In his time as Reich chancellor, Hitler became attached to a child, a blue-eyed little girl by the name of Bernhardine Nienau, whom he invited out of a crowd and treated to strawberries and whipped cream. So taken was he by the child and the conversation they had together that he told her she could come and see him whenever she wanted. They exchanged letters after this first meeting, but investigations initiated by Martin Bormann found the girl's grandmother to be Jewish. Hitler was annoyed, Liljegren writes, and commented, "There are some people who have a positive genius for spoiling all my little pleasures." However, they continued to correspond until 1938, and Bernhardine visited him on several occasions at the Berghof, again according to Liljegren. All this says nothing about Hitler's evil or goodness, and nothing about the ferocity of his hatred for the Jews, but rather a lot about its anatomy: Hitler was consumed by hatred and had been ever since he was growing up, and he had established a world for himself in which it was important to maintain remoteness from others, a world without family, close friends, and romantic attachments, an irreparable system in which all that was inside him found outer manifestation, including his hatred, which following Germany's defeat in World War I he directed toward the Jews and everything they stood for in his system. There, in that system, his hatred was absolute. But when something encroached upon it and entered the space between his own I and his convictions, a space which, besides whatever passageways there may have been within it that were unfamiliar to him, was quite empty, his hatred did not apply. His hatred applied to the others. In that space was the memory of his mother, for instance, and that it had remained so strong becomes plain to us in the fact that every Christmas, the time of his mother's death, he would descend into silence and dejection, as he did in 1915 at the front, and in that space too were the Jewish doctor, Bloch, and this ten-year-old girl, therefore his kindness to both. To Bernhardine's eyes he could maintain no remoteness, she was real, in that space together with him. The yearning for reality, for the authentic, and for nature is not dangerous. The dangerous force of Nazism was the exact opposite, remoteness to the world and the regimentation of the human that all ideological thinking creates. But if our culture removes itself from physical reality by placing the image before it, and if it levels out all differences in its extreme seriality, then it must be judged in the same way as Hitler, according to what it does and not what it is. The fact is that it does not exterminate people, either literally or metaphorically, that it does not persecute people or prevent their voices from being heard, and the question is then whether this culture, when all is said and done, provides an adequate response to an insoluble problem of the modern world that relates to the one and to the all. There is a difference between a country waging war and trying to wipe out an entire people in its name, and a lone killer taking the lives of sixty-nine children. We endeavor continually to safeguard ourselves against the former, but cannot safeguard ourselves against the latter. Both are to do with violence among like kind, and both arise out of remoteness, but there the similarity ends. Remoteness is the opposite of authenticity, and it is not the yearning for authenticity that is the problem, but the remoteness that gives rise to it. The unique is what cannot be replicated, existing only in a particular place at a particular time. It is the art of the one, and the life of the one. What took place in Germany was that the one dissolved into the all, the sky of ideals descended to earth, and the image of the absolute, which is without consequence, became a point of reference for human action. The absolute, in this case construed in terms of race, biology, blood, soil, nature, death, was not only set against the relative, construed in terms of the stock market, the entertainment industry, democratic parliamentarism, as occurred throughout the period leading up to World War I, but was also carried through into life itself, as action: Nazi Germany was the absolute state. It was the state its people could die for. Watching Riefenstahl's film of the rallies in Nuremberg, its depiction of a people almost paradisiac in its unambiguousness, converged upon the same thing, immersed in the symbols, the callings from the deepest pith of human life, that which has to do with birth and death, and with homeland and belonging, one finds it splendid and unbearable at the same time, though increasingly unbearable the more one watches, at least this was how I felt when I watched it one night this spring, and I wondered for a long time where that sense of the unbearable came from, the unease that accompanied these images of the German paradise, with its torches in the darkness, the intactness of its medieval city, its cheering crowds, its sun, and its banners, whether it was something I imposed upon them, knowing how this paradise arose, what it would become and at what cost, and what happened to it, but I came to the conclusion that this was not the reason, that it came not from what was in me, the knowledge I had of what lay behind the images of those days, but from something in the images themselves, the sense being that the world they displayed was an unbearable world. Not that it was a false world, because this was obvious, its every image meticulously created from scratch for that particular occasion, it was more that this false world, one of the few pure utopias to be established in the last century, in which everything was exactly the way it was supposed to be, was unbearable in itself. What was unbearable about it lay in its undifferentiatedness. Everything affirmed one and the same thing, and when this is the case no other thing exists but that one, and without the other the one dissolves into itself and vanishes. The one without the other is nothing. The society Riefenstahl portrayed, this utopia of the one, had to establish an other in order for its own simplicity, its own undifferentiatedness, to be maintained, and this is what lies beneath those peaceful and harmonious images and fills them with such foreboding: the inevitability of war. It was not the absolute values of Nazism that led them to war, for birth and death, homeland and belonging are characteristic of all people and all peoples, it was the utopia of the one and the same. It was the fall of the name into the number, it was the fall of the differentiating into the undifferentiated.

If we say that our present culture was founded in the seventeenth century, in the sense that all the elements that characterize our age appeared for the first time in that century, then two particular portal figures flank its door: Hamlet and Don Quixote. The creators of these figures, Shakespeare and Cervantes, died in the same year, and their understanding of the human condition, as radically dissimilar as they might appear in respect to each other, form two poles in the way we understand ourselves. In their day, the absolute, familiar to them under the name of the divine, was drawn increasingly closer to the relative, which is to say the interhuman domain, the social world. Hamlet doubts, and seemingly finds doubt to pervade everything. Don Quixote does not doubt, he believes, but what he believes in, and what he sees, since it fills his vision, is not real, belonging not to the world but to fiction. He sees sheep, aims his lance and attacks, imagining he sees an army of enemies. He sees a windmill, aims his lance and attacks, imagining he sees a giant. Don Quixote is a hero in a world without heroes, or in a world where heroes and the absoluteness of their lives belong to the pseudoworld, irreconcilable with the relative reality of the quotidian. Don Quixote is a comic hero. Hamlet is a hero too, but for the opposite reason, he doubts and relativizes in a world of absolutes. Hamlet is a tragic hero. Don Quixote sees the old world as if for the last time. Hamlet sees the old world as if for the first time. Through them we see ourselves, for our culture is founded on doubt, and our scope extends from the relative reality of the quotidian to the skies of our grandest conceptions. Hitler eliminated doubt and lowered the skies of our grandest conceptions to the relative reality of the quotidian, which is to say he inserted fiction into material reality and made reality a play, binding the individual to the mask.

As early as 1934, the Jewish philosopher Emmanuel Levinas wrote the following about Hitler and Hitlerism:

> The body is not only a happy or unhappy accident that relates us to the implacable world of matter. Its adherence to the Self is of value in itself. It is an adherence that one does not escape and that no metaphor can confuse with the presence of an external object; it is a union that does not in any way alter the tragic character of finality.
> This feeling of identity between self and body, which, naturally, has nothing in common with popular materialism, will therefore never allow those who wish to begin with it to rediscover, in the depths of this unity, the duality of a free spirit that struggles against the body to which it is chained. On the contrary, for such people, the whole of the spirit's essence lies in the fact that it is chained to the body. To separate the spirit from the concrete forms with which it is already involved is to betray the originality of the very feeling from which it is appropriate to begin.
> The importance attributed to this feeling for the body, with which the Western spirit has never wished to content itself, is at the basis of a new conception of man. The biological, with the notion of inevitability it entails, becomes more than an object of spiritual life. It becomes its heart. The mysterious urgings of the blood, the appeals of heredity and the past for which the body serves as an enigmatic vehicle, lose the character of being problems that are subject to a solution put forward by a sovereignly free Self. Not only does the Self bring in the unknown elements of these problems in order to resolve them; the Self is also constituted by these elements. Man's essence no longer lies in freedom, but in a kind of bondage . . . Chained to his body, man sees himself refusing the power to escape from himself. Truth is no longer for him the contemplation of a foreign spectacle; instead it consists in a drama in which man is himself the actor. It is under the weight of his whole existence, which includes facts on which there is no going back, that man will say his yes or his no.

This is man at one with himself, unified and whole. It is man as the one. Levinas, who became the philosopher of the other, turned in this reasoning as much to Heidegger as to Hitler, according to the Italian philosopher Giorgio Agamben, who cites the passage in his book Homo Sacer: Sovereign Power and Bare Life. For it is here, in the human construed as the one, at one with itself and its body, with no division between the being of the I and its ways of being, that Heidegger and Hitler come together, Agamben believes, where all anthropological distinctions – between spirit and body, sensation and consciousness, I and world, subject and properties – are abolished.

> Dasein, the Being-there who is its There, thus comes to be placed in a zone of indiscernability with respect to – and to mark the definitive collapse of – all traditional determinations of man.

The relative in our existence – all that may be chosen – is bound to that which is not relative but absolute and unambiguous, which in the case of the I is the biological body. Thereby the I approaches its "it," where all voices fall silent and the darkness of the undifferentiated prevals, and this movement toward life's absolute, its "it," is what makes it possible to separate the Jewish from the German, for the important distinction between they and we was drawn in the body, in race, which is to say in the immutable, whereas all other distinctions, such as those of language, thought, and culture, which may be learned and adapted, moderated and discussed, were absolutely invalid. Everything was pressed in toward the body, everything gathered in the body, and the final consequence of the human being at one with itself, which we tentatively call the monophonic human, at one with itself and shoulder to shoulder in unbroken series, for the next was not the other but the one again, the final consequence of this turning of the I toward the body, which is uniformity and unvariedness, was the extermination of the Jews, in which the Jew was body and limbs only. By the time they arrived at the extermination camps and were bundled from their cattle wagons they were no one. Deprived of their civil rights, deprived of their human rights, deprived of their names. They were the "it." On leaving the wagons, they were ordered to strip. Those then herded toward the gas chamber, which in Treblinka was situated on a small hill, were without citizenship, without name, without clothes. They were the naked human, without anything but its body, in the midst of what Agamben calls "bare life." What emerges before us in this image, which is not a metaphor, but an actual event, is what a human being is, and what it becomes. The human being, naked and bare, is this not the true and authentic human? The natural human, the human as a biological creature, as it is beneath the cloak of civilization and culture? If we imagine a world without language, without countries, without names, we would all have lived a life such as this, naked, nameless bodies in a nameless world, until death came and transformed the naked body into a corpse to be cast into the world of the dead, which is the world of decomposition and erosion. Such a life would take place in the very midst of the world, among its trees, waters, fells, and dales, upon the soil of the earth and beneath its sky, and yet it would be a life lived outside. Outside what? Outside the human world. For it is this that emerges before us in the image of the naked human; it is outside the law, outside the social world, outside the name. Only then, in that absence, are we able to see the nature of the law, the social world, the name. The law regulates violence among like kind, according responsibility for it to the individual, moreover at the same time institutionalizing it for the purposes of self-preservation in the police and military. The social world regulates the community; in it, all those it comprises are gathered in groups of greater and smaller we's, both formal and informal; and the name guarantees the individuality of the individual in the community of the all. If a person stands outside the law, they may be killed. If a person stands outside the social world, they are no one. If a person stands outside the name, they are a number. The Jews who were not immediately killed in Auschwitz were identified by a number tattooed on their forearm. But the matter is not so simple that we may say the Jews could be killed because everything belonging to the human domain was taken away from them, that civilization was negated in them and their fate, for the forces that took them there, outside the community of the human, were forces within that community, which is to say within civilization, our we. The bringing together of the I and the being of the body, drawing the human closer to the "it" of the I, thereby removing it both from history and from the moment, masks the human in uniformity and sameness, the play, which has always represented the possibilities of man, no longer a play but life itself, the way it unfolds. This bringing together occurred in parallel with, and was perhaps only possible by virtue of, a similar movement toward the it within the collective; the we, too, was drawn toward the it, which is to say the number. In bureaucracy the human is a number, and in the mass the human is a number. This dehumanization of the we, whereby the other may be reduced to a number, is necessary in war if the enemy is to be killed, and it is necessary in the administration of large numbers of people even now, for a modern state without statistics is unthinkable, but in Hitler's Germany the state became a total entity, the we merged completely with the state, they were one and the same, and in much the same way as the I was bound to the body and possessed no space of its own outside, the we was bound to the state and possessed no space of its own outside, and in much the same way as this made it possible to push the Jewish I into the "it," reducing it to body alone, it also made it possible to push the Jewish we into the "it,"reducing it to number alone. Neither the I of the body nor the we of the state contained any singular you. It was for this reason that millions of Jews could be sent to the gas chambers before the eyes of everyone, without anything happening other than that they looked down, they looked away, for what was there to see? There was nothing to see. They saw nothing, they heard nothing, they said nothing. The it of the body: undifferentiated. The it of the we: undifferentiated. Outside the language they were driven into the terrain, along the unmistakable track, and became, in undifferentiated night, ash.

Nowhere does anyone ask after you, for "you" does not exist.

It's evening already. I'm on my own at home, Linda and the children are still in Corsica with Linda's mother. Heidi has lost a front tooth there, she told me proudly on the phone. I'm looking forward to seeing her smile when she comes home. John has got a new air bed in the shape of a crocodile and fell and hurt his knee, as far as I could make out from his incoherent and breathless report. Vanja didn't want to talk on the phone, but she cried when I said goodbye to them on the train platform and walked away, and she's never done that before. Since they left, four days ago now, I've spent every day and evening writing, watching Shoah into the night, apart from yesterday when I read Sereny's book about Treblinka. Shoah doesn't get to me, either because I'm keeping a distance or because it works through insight rather than feelings. Which isn't entirely true because suddenly, out of nothing, a scene made me weep, a single stab of empathy, and that was it, I carried on watching as before. Sereny's book, which almost paralyzed me the first time I read it, left me unmoved too. But that's when I'm awake. When I'm asleep, I dream about it.

Earlier today I was sitting on the balcony, smoking and looking out over the rooftops as I always do. The sky was pale blue, typical for May, and the usual sounds rose from the city below: the rumble of buses, the squealing of brakes, the hum of tires moving over the road surfaces, an occasional shout. On the roof of the apartments opposite some Polish builders have a project going, they've been there for months now, putting in roof terraces and converting the loft space into living units. Suddenly a child laughed somewhere. It was such a joyful laugh, so overwhelming and gleeful and utterly abandoned to the delight of the moment that I felt it too. I smiled, and got to my feet to see where it was coming from. It sounded like a young child, maybe three or four years old. There was a man's voice in there too, and I imagined it was a father tossing his child into the air, again and again. But there was no one there when I looked down into the street below, no one in the parking spaces, or outside the garage. Then there it was again. I guessed it had to be coming from the little passage connecting the pedestrian street with the street behind our building, and that they were hidden from sight by the building in between. I sat down again, poured myself some tepid coffee from the thermos, and lit another cigarette.

When the alarm clock rang it was still dark outside. I turned it off and got up. Linda lay still in bed, her face on the pillow almost completely obscured by her hair, which spread out in all directions. It was half past four, and my whole body ached with tiredness, I had lain awake for so long before I fell asleep. That seldom happened; if there was one thing in my life that worked it was my sleep. I was what they call a sound sleeper. I could sleep on the floor without any problem, and with children screaming a meter away from me, it didn't make any difference; if I was asleep, I was asleep. Once I had thought it was a sign that I wasn't a real writer. Writers slept badly, had ravaged faces, at the crack of dawn they sat at the kitchen table staring out the window, tormented by their inner demons, which never rested.

Who had ever heard of a great writer who slept like a child?

To think that was a bad sign, I reasoned. Because tomorrow my third book was coming out. Reviews in all the newspapers.

I grabbed the clothes I had laid out the night before and padded into the bathroom to shower. The sight of them triggered a fit of nerves. My hand holding the showerhead shook with unease as I clambered into the bath. I turned on the water and shivered as the hot jets hit skin which had just emerged from the warm depths of the duvet and would have preferred to stay there. But then, after only a few minutes, everything changed, and getting out of the shower was what would make me shiver.

After the thrum of the shower, everything was silent. Not a sound from the streets outside, not a sound from our apartment or the apartments below. It was as though I was meant to be alone in the world.

In the harsh light I rubbed myself down with a large towel, and once my skin was relatively dry I wiped the steam off the mirror and put styling gel in my hair and deodorant under my arms while observing my reflection, which slowly became less and less sharp as the water molecules, or whatever they were, attached themselves to the glass again.

I donned my Ted Baker shirt, which stuck to my still-damp shoulder blades and would not hang straight at first, then I got into my Pour jeans with the diagonal pockets, which usually I didn't like, there was something so conventional about them, all Dockers trousers had slanting pockets, but on a pair of jeans there was so much else working against the Dockers look that they actually looked good, for then it was the jeans style that was being challenged and as a result a kind of tension grew, not much, but in a world where all denims looked identical, it was enough to make these just that little bit different.

I wiped the floor with the used towel and draped it over the side of the bathtub, went into the kitchen, put on the kettle, spooned some Nescafé into a cup, and looked out the window while waiting for the water to boil. The window faced east and a patch of something brighter in the distance had begun to emerge from the darkness. Impatiently I lifted the kettle before the water had started to bubble, and the crescendo of noise was interrupted and replaced by a soft murmur as the coffee rose inside the cup, at first a golden brown from the powder, visible as an earthy clump at the bottom, until over the next few seconds it completely dissolved and the surface became an impenetrable black with some lighter-colored froth at the edges.

Cup in hand, I went out to the balcony, sat down, and took out a cigarette. A plane passed high above like a small ball of light; it was still too dark for me to distinguish the fuselage from the sky around it. In an hour and a half I would be sitting up there myself, I reflected, and then I thought of the Cortázar short story which so often surfaced from my subconscious when I was sitting here because it shifted perspective in such a dizzyingly abrupt way between someone on board a plane and someone on the ground, to be precise on an island in the Mediterranean. Cortázar was the master of giddy shifts of perspective, and even if his short stories occasionally bore a likeness to those of Borges, in this respect he was unrivaled.

The man reading about the man reading about the man reading. The line of faces which disappeared into the illusory depths of the mirror when, as a boy, I had stood in front of it holding another mirror to reflect the image. Smaller and smaller and smaller, deeper and deeper into the distance, into all eternity, for it was impossible to stop this movement, it could only become so small that it could not be distinguished from its surroundings.

I drew the smoke deep into my lungs. I was cold, partly because I was wearing only a shirt, partly because I was tired. And partly because I was afraid.

But there was nothing to be afraid of, was there?

The plane was no more than a tiny dot now while daybreak seemed to have come closer to the town, and the darkness in the air between the buildings below me was filled with a kind of light so hazy that it was as if someone had stirred the gloom, causing the light hiding at the bottom to mingle and rise to the surface.

Ever since I was in my teens I had imagined that the universe might well be microscopic and perhaps encapsulated in an atom belonging to a different universe, which in turn was enclosed in an atom in a different universe, and so on ad infinitum. But it was only when I read Pascal and saw the same idea there that it gained validity and authority as a distinct possibility. Yes, that was probably how it was. The fractal system, on which so much in our world is based, was like that: an image within an image within an image, ad infinitum.

I stubbed out my cigarette in the ashtray, chucked the rest of the coffee over the railing, heard it hit the roof far below as I opened the door and went in. Placed the cup on the counter, put on my new suit jacket and new shoes, packed a tub of hairstyling gel, an extra pair of underpants, and a shirt in my backpack, passport, plane ticket, cigarettes, and lighter in the outside pocket, hung one strap over my shoulder and was about to open the door when Linda came in.

"Are you off?" she said.

"Yes," I replied.

"Well, good luck," she said.

We kissed briefly.

"See you tomorrow!" I said.

"Yes, looking forward to that," she answered.

I walked out to the elevator. She closed the door behind me, I averted my eyes from the mirror on the way down, lit a cigarette as I emerged onto the street. There were two taxis outside the hotel, I ambled toward the traffic lights and crossed over to them. The driver in the first car was asleep. I leaned forward and knocked on the window with one knuckle. He didn't give a start, as I had expected, but instead opened his eyes without moving his head or body, evincing a kind of out-of-place regal dignity.

The window slid down.

"Are you free?" I asked.

"Yes," he replied. "Where do you want to go?"

I opened the rear door and got in. Actually the plan had been to catch a taxi to the railway station and then the train to Kastrup, but it didn't feel right to wake him up for such a short trip, which would earn him no more than a hundred kronor, besides which I needed the immense feeling of power and luxury it would give me if I went by taxi all the way to the airport, something I had never done before, apart from once with the children when we were going to the Canary Islands and had so much luggage we didn't feel like lugging it all onto the train.

"Kastrup," I said. "Is it a set price?"

"Yes," he said, flashing his left indicator.

It cost four hundred more. Almost as much as the plane ticket. But what the hell. The novel was coming out tomorrow. I would be getting at least sixty thousand kroner for it. Surely I could indulge myself. Besides, I was going to do a lot of interviews, so it was important I was rested and my energy levels were up, after all, this was my job.

I leaned back in the seat and looked at the town, its lights glinting in the gray dawn, and another wave of nerves surged through me.

For nearly two years I had worked as a language consultant on the new Norwegian translation of the Bible, and I had caught the plane from Kastrup to Gardermoen so often, there and back in a day, that what I had previously considered unremarkable, though it was certainly unusual, a kind of travelfest, had now become routine, as commonplace as catching the bus. I collected my boarding pass from one of the machines in the departure hall and walked up to the first floor and over to the security control in the long corridors there. My jacket over my arm and belt in hand, I put the backpack on the carousel when it was my turn, picked it up on the other side, surrounded by besuited men in their fifties and equally professionally dressed women, some cheery and outgoing, others withdrawn into themselves, standing like trees. I presumed that I would give the same impression if anyone looked at me when I looked at them. I put my belt back on and then my jacket as I walked through the tax-free shopping area to the café at the entrance to the B gates, where I would usually sit after buying Norwegian and Danish newspapers in the big kiosk there, and had a coffee at the bar.

I had hardly talked to anyone about the novel, apart from those closest to me, and they saw me and themselves in it with none of the objectivity a normal novel required, so I knew little about how it seemed from the outside, to people who had nothing to do with me. It was difficult to predict what questions the journalists would ask. But as soon as they began, a certain way of regarding the book would be established because they always thought alike, always asked the same questions, and once I had said something to one of them, then I said the same to the next, it became a kind of platform for the book, which in turn became the book because what was written in the newspapers the following day was further reinforced by a fairly large circle of readers and interested parties, who discussed it on the basis of this same platform. The next time I did interviews the journalists had prepared by reading earlier interviews and reviews. In the process everything apart from a couple of points was filtered away, and these were then so squeezed and wrung dry until the book completely lost any signs of life and lay dead and buried in a warehouse somewhere outside Oslo.

But one thing was certain this time, and that was that they'd ask about the autobiographical element. Why did I write about myself? What was it that made me so interesting that I could write not only one novel based on my life but six? Was I a narcissist? Why did I use people's real names? That would be fine, they weren't impossible questions to answer, but if they honed in on individual names, my father and his mother, for instance, and their various relatives, and were bent on talking about the novel's depiction of reality in specific rather than general terms – Grandma and Dad and those days in Kristiansand – it could turn out to be a nightmare.

A clue as to what they would be asking about was given in the three interviews I had done in Malmö: one for Dagbladet, one for Dagens Næringsliv, and one for Bokprogrammet on NRK. Both Dagbladet and Dagens Næringsliv had been preoccupied with what I had written about myself, about the person I was now. About having no friends, no interest in social life, and about getting so drunk that I lost all self-control. These matters had been almost impossible to talk about. Who would want to state in the newspaper that they don't have any friends? When I was writing this wasn't a problem since what I wrote was how things were for me, sitting alone in my room. This novel was tightly drawn around me and my life, but as soon as it all came out into the open, everything changed. An immense distance appeared within this private world that belonged to me and my family, it became an "object," something public, while in reality that which we moved about in, without this ever being formulated, was not a thing, admittedly in the novel it had been given form, but the big difference between a novel and a newspaper article was that the first belonged to an intimate sphere – it was closely associated with an "I," a specific voice – which the novel reached beyond, as it also addressed itself to one or more readers, although it never left what was its own and what was personal; a newspaper article, on the other hand, had no such personal ties, and therefore it changed everything that was in the novel and turned it into something else, something public and general, with the power of a judgment: Knausgaard has no friends, Knausgaard loses control of himself when he drinks, Knausgaard yells at his children. And that was how it was with everything I wrote in that novel. The novel is an intimate genre and its intimate nature doesn't change even if eight thousand copies are printed, because it is read by only one person at any one time and would never leave the private sphere. But when the newspapers discussed what I wrote, there was no longer any connection with this private sphere, there was no longer any connection with the intimate sphere, it was objective and public, detached from the "I," and even though it was still related to me and my world, it was solely via my name, its exterior, "Knausgaard," one object among other objects – and only then did what the novel was about become a "thing." I had decided not to read any of the interviews I was going to do, or any of the reviews, they would make me die of self-hatred when I saw my inner self from the outside like that, but the Dagens Næringsliv journalist, a young Sørlander, had insisted I read his review before it went to print, which I did, and I would never do that again. In an e-mail to him I compared my experience of this to an animal being transfixed in the beam of a searchlight.

I enacted various scenarios in my head as I sat in the airport, trying to find an answer to any questions that might crop up – while looking out the window at the planes standing in readiness and the small airport vehicles darting to and fro like toys against the backdrop of the vast, now sheer blue sky and the sun, which, shining from the other side, made the glass and metal sparkle wherever its rays struck; I gazed too at the throng of people, more here than anywhere else – until it was time to board, at which point I got up, put the newspapers in my backpack, and walked down the corridor to the gate, when another colossal surge of nerves, like a torrent of fear, quivered through my body as I sat down.

I had no doubt that Fædrelandsvennen, the newspaper in Kristiansand, would get as close to the truth as they could. They would probably be indignant, for one did not write about one's private life, and it was extremely likely they had spoken to Gunnar and would push me as hard as they could on that. Court case, lack of regard for the facts, unscrupulous exploitation of innocent people for personal gain.

I got up, I couldn't sit any longer, and went to the toilet, forced out a dribble of dark yellow pee, washed my hands, put them under the hand dryer or whatever they called the little hot-air machine attached to the wall next to the mirror. After coming out, I wandered down the corridor to a duty-free shop, cast an eye over the goods for a few minutes and walked back, the line for the plane had formed, the airline employee behind the gate desk had opened the door to the jet bridge and was busy checking passports and scanning ticket bar codes.

As the plane lifted from the runway and rose into the sky I scoured the land beyond the strait, searching for the house where we lived. It wasn't difficult; it was directly opposite the Hilton, which was the second-highest building in Malmö. It was incomprehensible that only two hours earlier I had been sitting there and looking up here, and also that everything down there had felt as big as up here, because from where I was now I could not only make out the balcony where I usually sat, I could also see all the square kilometers of buildings around it where several hundred thousand other bright sparks sat looking at the world as if they were the only ones in it.

Linda and the children must be up by now, I thought, and recognized first Landskrona, then Helsingborg below me, after which the countryside became anonymous and featureless and somehow homogenized: fields, yeah, right; roads, yeah, right; villages, yeah, right. I took out the newspapers and read until the plane started its descent toward Gardermoen, and I looked down on the sunlit woodlands, dark green with the scattered reds and yellows of autumn, like cries from more unruly trees rent with yearning and happiness and death amid the tranquil, paternal spruces and firs.

A river, dark, some fields, yellow. Some cars, which seemed lonely even when in long lines of traffic. Everything below bore all the signs of waiting for winter not even the Indian-summer sun could erase.

Slowly the plane descended from the sky until the wheels hit the ground and began to roll along the runway, the flight attendant's voice welcomed us to Oslo and asked us to keep our seat belts fastened, which almost everyone ignored, we knew it wasn't dangerous anymore, no one would punish us if we didn't obey, that was what you call freedom.

Click, click, click, everywhere. I usually waited until almost everyone had left the plane before I got up, but now I was short of time, so I pushed my way into the aisle, shrugged on my backpack, and switched on my phone, as everyone around me was doing. I hadn't received any text messages of course, I never did, but no one else knew that.

I put the phone in my inside pocket and met the gaze of a woman in her fifties, she had just lifted a bag down from the overhead bin and was twisting around to place it on the floor.

"Fantastic books you write," she said. "Thank you very much."

Embarrassed, I returned her gaze, my cheeks warm, my lips forming a half smile.

"A Time for Everything is the best book I've read in years," she continued.

"Thank you," I said. "That's nice. I'm happy to hear that."

She gave me a warm smile and then turned to face the front again.

A stranger had never addressed me to talk about my books before. If that wasn't a good sign, I didn't know what was.

An hour later I got out of a taxi in Kristian Augusts gate, paid, and walked through the gateway of the building where Oktober had its offices. The publishing house had just extended its premises and now occupied two floors; I assumed it was the money that Anne B. Ragde's books had generated that had made this possible. I rang the bell, fortunately someone buzzed the door open without asking who I was, I hated standing in front of those little boxes and introducing myself. When I got up to the first floor there was Silje, waiting for me. I was given a cup of coffee, we went up to the floor above and I sat down on the black leather sofa just inside the door where the first interview was to take place and lit up. Geir Berdahl came in to say hello, perhaps it had been the smell of cigarette smoke that had reached him in his office at the other end. He told me the book hadn't arrived yet. It was supposed to have been here the day before, but the truck had been involved in an accident in Sweden; as far as he understood, it had gone off the road to avoid a wild boar. He laughed, I smiled. Then he turned serious, as was his wont, reined himself in after all his merriment and said this wasn't good, tomorrow it was being reviewed in all the newspapers and there wasn't a single copy in any of the bookshops. But he would personally drive a consignment to the big bookshops in Oslo early tomorrow, he said with a fleeting smile, and returned to his office after wishing me good luck. I sat back down on the sofa, Silje came in with a thermos of coffee, a cup for the journalist, water, and some glasses. I visualized a truckload of books between lines of trees in a Swedish forest, the driver climbing down from his cabin, a phone pressed to his ear, smoke rising from the hood, total silence after the door has slammed shut. Then I pictured Geir Berdahl with disheveled hair and tousled beard driving through the streets of Oslo in a small Toyota crammed with books. That must have been how he worked in the seventies when Oktober was a Marxist-Leninist publishing house with its own chain of book dealers through whom they distributed translations of Marx and Mao to the Norwegian population. I knew next to nothing about that period, everything was wreathed in myth, and I decided I would ask him the next time an opportunity offered itself. In fact I had given him nothing but trouble; I owed the company a lot of money because I hadn't had a book published for five years – although I had no idea how much; it could be anywhere between three and seven hundred thousand kroner, and now that I had finally finished a novel he had to deal with my uncle, who was sending him malicious, rabid e-mails, and talk to him on the phone, as well as having to engage a firm of lawyers to scrutinize my manuscript and all the details of the case. That this should happen to me was actually pretty damned idiotic and unbelievable. I had never gone looking for trouble in my life, as far as possible I tried to be kind and friendly and polite and decent, I just wanted everyone to like me, that was all, and here I was, in such a storm of aggrieved people and lawyers, not through ill fortune but following a reasonable response to an act I had committed. I wanted nothing more than to write and be an author, so how could I have ended up in a situation where lawyers had to read everything I wrote? I had their observations at home along with the usual consultants' reports I had received over the years, and it was remarkable how different the lawyers' ones were. In normal circumstances this would have been interesting because the law was language, and when it had to be applied, it wasn't in any absolute way, it was always a question of an assessment, which had to be formulated with as much precision and exactitude as possible. The lawyers had to describe whatever the case might be, in other words what had happened, and in court this was of course often the crux of the conflict: what had actually happened? And once this was established, with what motives? And to what effect? It was not unlike a novelist's work.

The difference was that the lawyers not only had to understand the acts in themselves but also how they applied to the law, which furthermore was in writing, formulated on the basis of expectation regarding future events, thus as a kind of prognosis – based on thousands of years' experience of mankind, which indicated that theft, embezzlement, and murder would continue to occur while some of the more culture-specific laws died as the culture that had necessitated them also died. Actions were languageless, while the law and its interpretation were language-based. A law without language was as inconceivable as a poem without language. Law and poetry were connected; they were two sides of the same coin.

One of the other editors walked past, smiled, congratulated me on my book, and disappeared into his office. Silje talked me through the schedule, I listened with half an ear; it was a long time since I had dreaded anything so much. The doorbell rang, that would be the journalist, and I went into the bathroom for a pee and to put some more gel in my hair, there was to be a photo session after the interview.

When I returned, the journalist from the Norwegian News Agency had arrived. She was dressed in a way, or had an air about her, that I associated with motorbikes. We shook hands, she said the photographer was on his way, we sat down, she began to ask her questions, it was going very well, I thought, and the questions were of a general nature except when they concerned me. Half an hour or so later I was in the backyard being photographed and then I was ready for the next item on the agenda, the telephone interview with Bergens Tidende. I spent the intervening minutes in Geir Gulliksen's office; he had come while I was doing the interview with the NNA journalist. We talked about the next novel. We had edited the first one together here, he had sat with the manuscript in front of him, I had the computer, and we had worked through his suggestions, most of which were deletions. Apart from the opening, which we considered removing because the tone was so different from the rest of the manuscript, and the long passage about the new year's party, which he wanted to take out, I did exactly what he recommended. I could see at once it was better. The text was tighter and had more force. Now, sitting there, him on his swivel chair by the desk, me on a chair up against the wall, I asked him when we should begin editing the second volume. It had been ready for a while, but when all the fuss surrounding the first started I realized it couldn't come out in its present form, it was far too aggressive and in some parts almost slanderous, I had been frustrated and angry when I wrote it, and the frustration and anger had occasionally infused it in ways that would damage both me and those I had written about. I had deleted the worst of it, but the balance was still wrong. The idea was that I should write about my life as it was now and then go back in time, through my childhood, up through my teenage years into adulthood, to end with meeting Linda in Sweden, in such a way that our love story, which was so intense, would cast its light back on the events of the second book. But the patience this required was inhuman, the picture I painted of us too one-dimensional, and it felt as if what was supposed to provide depth and perhaps give a rationale was too far ahead for it to work. So one morning, only a week earlier, I had sat down and written the story of when we met and what happened between us. Almost exactly twenty-four hours later I had finished, the story had turned into fifty pages and exuded the light the novel needed so that all the rest would not be incomprehensible. I had an hour's sleep, then I left to do an interview with Dagbladet in the café in Malmö Art Gallery, exhausted in a way I felt only when I had been drinking the night before.

"We don't need to do any more," Geir said now. "We'll publish it as it is."

"Do you mean that?" I said.

"Yes, I do," he said.

"Are you sure?"

"As sure as I can be."

"No deletions? Nothing?"

"The little there is we can do at the proofreading stage."

"I'll have to trust you," I said.

"Yes, you will," he said with a laugh. "By the way, how did it go with the NNA?"

"It went pretty well, I think. But now it's Bergens Tidende. I'm dreading it."

"It'll be fine," he said. "I talked to him yesterday, as I told you. What was his name? Tønder?"

"Yes."

"First off he said he just wanted a bit of background info about you. But I knew right away he had an agenda."

"What was it then?"

"Well, it was all about the biographical details."

"So he knew about Gunnar?"

"He did."

"What did you tell him?"

"I told him I couldn't talk about your book in those terms. I think he understood. He just asked about this and that. I don't think you have anything to fear."

"I hope not," I said.

Silje knocked on the half-open door and popped her head in.

"You can call him from an office on the floor below," she said.

"Now?" I asked.

"Yes, I think he's probably ready and waiting."

I got up and followed her down the stairs. The office was at the back to the left. The coffeepot and my cup had mysteriously moved to the desk there. Beside the phone lay a pen and a pad. Silje passed me a slip of paper with a phone number on it.

"Here's his number," she said. "Dial zero first."

"Thank you," I said, and sat down. She left and closed the door behind her. It went through my head that I didn't have to call. I doodled on the pad. Then I pulled myself together, lifted the receiver, and dialed the number.

The voice at the other end spoke Bergen dialect, and whenever I've heard anyone speaking Bergen dialect since, I have heard that voice resonate and it's sent shivers down my spine. It is the most unpleasant voice I have heard in the forty-nine years I have been alive and it was the most unpleasant conversation I have ever had. It wasn't what the voice said, I don't remember that very clearly, no, it was the tone it was said in, which fluctuated between flattery and condemnation, though without ever relinquishing a sense of self-righteousness, however insidious or covert.

During the two years that have passed since the first volume of this novel appeared I have met a lot of journalists, and I have always had something good to say about them, there has always been something conciliatory about them, whatever they have written and however stupidly or nonsensically or uncompromisingly they have described me, but there was nothing conciliatory about this voice, it was just hideous, and I never want to hear it again. After the interview was over I felt nauseous, and repulsive to myself, the voice had been in my ear, in my head, and I had never realized before that a voice was an alien force that could penetrate your body and fill you with its being. The worst thing about this voice was that it seemed to be trying to lure me into a trap, a bit like the way you can imagine the police interrogate their suspects, switching between everyday topics in order to gain their confidence and give them enough scope to slip up, to say more than they should, only then to ask a question that can nail them. You weren't there, were you? You were actually there, weren't you? You can tell me. I know what really happened.

The voice was like that. It asked me why I hadn't written about my mother in the novel. That is a strange question to ask a novelist who has written about his relationship with his father and his father's death. Why did Kafka write letters only to his father and not to his mother? The voice didn't ask the question because it wondered why my mother wasn't in the novel, it knew that very well, underlying the question was an accusation, unformulated but obvious, and all it wanted was for me to admit it. I didn't, of course. Instead I said it was a book about my father and my father's death, not about my mother and my mother's death, and the voice, which didn't believe a word of what I said made a mental note to be used later when I contradicted myself and was beginning to fall into the trap. It was an interrogation, not an interview. The voice assured me it had really enjoyed the book and asked some relatively harmless questions. It wanted to know in what way the novel related to reality. After my answer he said that I had claimed the novel was about reality, but it was also at odds with reality, and he wanted to know how I could explain that.

"You write that your father lived for two years with his mother. But that's not true, is it? He stayed there for only two months, didn't he?"

"I did not write that," I said. "That's not in the book. It doesn't say anything about how long he lived there."

"Yes, it does. It says he lived there for two years."

"No, it doesn't. I took it out. You couldn't have read that. It's not there."

The voice was silent for a few seconds. Then, in a confidential, deeper tone, it said:

"As you know, I've spoken to your family."

"You've spoken to Gunnar?"

"Yes. He says what you've written doesn't correspond with the facts. In the book you're presented as a hero. But actually you're not such a fine fellow. You didn't really clean the whole house, now did you. You don't know how to clean, isn't that the truth of the matter?"

I said I had cleaned the house exactly as I had described, and that cleaning was about the only thing I could do well, but it wasn't possible to talk about the novel in this way, discussing whether it was me or my uncle who had cleaned the house, this was absurd. Again I could tell the voice wasn't taking in a word of what I said, and I had myself lived with the image it had of me ever since I hit puberty, I was an untrustworthy little shit with a high opinion of myself, no morality, no self-restraint, none of the common decency necessary to be a respectable person. And I had written that I had cleaned my grandmother's entire house after my father's death to present myself in a favorable, honorable light whereas in fact it had been my uncle who had cleaned the place. And I had turned my father's death into something verging on the grotesque and transformed what had been an ordinary heart attack into the result of a self-destructive hell on earth and, not content with that, I had even dragged my ever kind, sweet old grandmother through the mud and mire, which was mine and no one else's. And behind all this towered my mother, the Knausgaard-Avenger, who had turned her son's head.

Why hadn't I written more about my mother? Why had I described her in such positive terms and my father in such negative ones? Why had I written that my father lived with my grandmother for two years when the truth was that he had stayed there for two months, and barely that? Why had I written that I had cleaned the whole house when I barely knew anything about cleaning and had actually got in the way?

It wasn't just that the voice obviously believed everything that Gunnar had told it, including the theory that it was my mother who had indoctrinated me, which upset me so much I felt nauseous sitting there with the phone in my hand, it was also the insidious way this was expressed, faintly acknowledging I was good at writing while at the same time maintaining I lied and was mendacious, an immoral person, yes, that voice spoke to me as if I were a criminal. It was one thing for Gunnar to do this, after all he was deeply involved in this business, and I was the one who had involved him, against his will, so regardless of whatever accusations he came up with, I was to blame. But this voice wasn't involved, I wasn't to blame for any of its accusations, yet it passed judgment on me, with all the moral legitimacy and self-righteousness the post of journalist at Bergen's biggest newspaper could accord while nonetheless wanting something from me and needing me, for the sake of the news story. It knew: no me, no article, so it both condemned and begged me at one and the same odious time.

Yes, it was an odious voice.

I knew it had believed Gunnar. Berdahl, who had also spoken to Gunnar on the phone, said he came across as collected, sensible, and moderate. It was only in his e-mails that he unleashed his fury. The crime correspondent at Bergens Tidende had spoken to him on the phone and believed him. Gunnar was an accountant, a respectable citizen, as was the voice, I could imagine, and when my novel was read with that in mind he saw exactly what Gunnar saw: I was untrustworthy, mendacious, and had written the novel because I hated the Knausgaard family and, prompted by my mother, wanted to take revenge on them. With that Gunnar had deprived me of all my independence and individuality: even hating was not something I did of my own accord but on behalf of my mother. He had turned my novel into a burlesque, something unworthy and contemptible. Bergens Tidende agreed with him about everything. I had lied, and what I had written was not a novel but trivial and socially unacceptable, an attack on living people in book form.

I didn't think any of this during the conversation with that insidious, half-begging, half-condemning voice because it had taken over, I had more than enough to do defending myself, and not even when the interview was over did I think about it. The sense that I was a criminal and the fear of the consequences of what I had written, which was now beginning to make itself felt, shut out everything else. It was these same feelings that had raged inside me throughout the end of summer. Completely under their sway, my mind in turmoil, which can happen when a catastrophe beckons but still hasn't struck, I left the room, went up to the floor above and into Geir's office. I felt sick and my insides were trembling. But just sitting there helped. I told him what had been said and when Geir Berdahl came in I repeated it. Geir told me the journalist had said the same to him the evening before: my father hadn't stayed for more than two months with his mother and I hadn't cleaned the house as I had written. Geir had thought the journalist was testing this out on him and wouldn't make the same allegations in an interview with me.

"But I soon realized he wasn't interested in the novel. He was only interested in this. It was his news story."

"Fortunately I told him I wanted to read everything connected with Gunnar," I said. "So he said he would e-mail it to me in the course of the day."

"That's good," Geir said. "It'll be coming out soon and we'll have to take a stand on it. I'm not sure it's going to be much of a problem."

"Actually Siri Økland was down to do this interview," I said. "Einar Økland's daughter. But then they put him on it. Slightly heavier artillery. He's a former crime correspondent, you know."

"That's right. You said."

"Oh, shit," I said.

Geir laughed.

"It'll be fine, Karl Ove," he said.

"That's the most unpleasant conversation I've ever had. He flattered and humiliated me at the same time. My God, and in such a creepy way."

"Yes, he was unpleasant. I thought the same."

"And now it's Fædrelandsvennen's turn. This is the one I've dreaded most. If Bergens Tidende rang around my family what do you think they would have been up to?"

"I don't think they'll have done anything," Geir said.

"I hope you're right," I said, getting up. "That BT interview was the worst experience of my life."

I went down into the street with Silje, where the sun was shining, bright and clear, past the National Gallery and down Karl Johans gate. On the way I stopped outside a newspaper kiosk and picked up a copy of Morgenbladet. Silje, who understood what was going through my mind, said there wasn't a review section today. I put it back on the stand, we entered the Grand Hotel, where Ibsen used to sit with a mirror in his top hat, and took the elevator up to the bar at the top, where the journalist and the photographer from Fædrelandsvennen were waiting. I sat down with the journalist at a table on the terrace. She had made a point of wearing sunglasses so that she didn't have to look into my eyes. The book had shaken her, she said. From the way she spoke I realized she hadn't made any moral judgments. I talked about what she wanted to talk about, as warily as possible, beneath the blue, cloudless September sky, and afterward the photographer took pictures of me on the other side of the terrace. I did another interview, this time with a journalist from Morgenbladet, and I sat smoking and drinking Farris mineral water and coffee while answering his questions. His name was Håkon, I seemed to remember, or it might have been Harald, he came from almost the same place as me, had grown up on the other side of the bridge, and wanted to talk about it, and that was good because as a result there was some distance from both me and the book.

After lunch I took a taxi up to NRK. I arrived twenty minutes early, so I sat down on a rock outside and was having a smoke in the sunshine when I heard a Swedish voice from somewhere, I turned and saw Carl-Johan Vallgren, a Swedish writer I had met a couple of times in Stockholm, getting out of a taxi and walking toward the reception desk. He was about to launch his latest book in Norway. I stubbed out my cigarette and followed him. He was standing with his back to me as I entered, so I placed my hand on his shoulder, which normally I would never do to anyone, but somehow circumstances had colluded to bring me in here. He turned and when he saw who it was he smiled. He was wearing a suit, and his seventies shirt with large collar points was open at the neck. We shook hands, I said I had enjoyed his last book, he said all the writers in Oslo had been talking about me ever since he arrived, and their voices were not without a touch of envy. He was laughing as he spoke and turned to face the lobby, where someone was coming to fetch him. See you, I said, yes, see you, he replied, after which I went out for another smoke and to call Linda. Meeting him had put me in a better frame of mind, he was the kind of person who lifts your mood when you meet them, some people are like that, not many. I definitely wasn't one of them.

Linda was sitting outside at a café in Malmö, where the weather was good too. The morning had gone well, she said, her mother had arrived and in the evening my mother would be arriving. I said the interviews had gone fine and there were two more to do before I left to see Axel and Linn. Sounds good, I'm looking forward to tomorrow, she said. I answered that I was too, and then we said goodbye and hung up.

The interview with Søndagsavisen went pretty well. Afterward Siss Vik met me in reception and we went up to her office and did the interview for Ordfront. For the first time that day I spoke about literature. What I said was vague and not very good, but it was about literature and that in itself felt cathartic. I imagined it was a bit like how a shy plumber might feel after having to speak all day to the media about himself and his feelings, his family and friends, when at long last, late in the afternoon, he was able to talk about pipes and washers.

I took a taxi from NRK to Axel's, he didn't live that far away, and when I arrived he had made fårikål, lamb and cabbage stew, the whole apartment was full of a smell that took me straight back to the autumns of my childhood. He said he figured I didn't get much of this stew in Sweden, at any rate that had been his experience when he lived there, it had been one of the things he missed. He was right about that, apart from once during the first autumn Linda and I were together, when I was busy explaining to her who I was and where I came from and therefore made both fårikål and pinnekjøtt, mutton ribs, I hadn't tasted it since I moved to Sweden.

Linn, Axel's wife, had to go somewhere after work. I sat in the kitchen with Axel's sons, Erik and Johan, eating lamb stew and drinking beer. I had arranged to visit them for exactly this reason, being with a family was balm for the soul, there was something good about it, maybe also something innocent, certainly uncorrupted. If I had gone to a hotel room after the interviews everything that had been said and done in the course of the day would have still been there, washing back and forth inside me, and it was not beyond the bounds of possibility that I would have ended up lying on the bed crying, it had happened before. Geir Angell had laughed when once I told him this, he said that was just like Arthur Arntzen, the comic, performing as Oluf, he ordered sandwiches and milk to be brought up to his hotel room and then, after the shows, he sat there crying and eating. I'd laughed too, but when I was caught up in it I didn't laugh, I had more than enough to do just trying to survive. What actually upset me I had no idea, it was utterly indefinable, but it was as though all the malice I had in me opened up and had free rein on days like that. At the interviews it was all about pinning something down, giving form to something, in a way, in order to keep it at a distance, while that which was given external form created ever greater turbulence internally. When, some years ago, a TV channel ran a series of twenty-four-hour interviews with people in their own homes, including one with Jan Kjærstad, I discussed this with Tore, who told me I would have maintained the mask if they had done one with me, answering good-humoredly and politely throughout the day, but the minute they went out the door I would have gone to bed and burst into tears. I had never told Tore I cried after being on live TV, and I occasionally did so after run-of-the-mill literary events as well, so I gaped at him in puzzlement, how had he worked that out? Was I so easy to read?

So this, stew and beer, at a kitchen table in Oslo, with Axel and his sons, the sun low and the air cold outside, was exactly what I needed.

I had met Axel in Stockholm four years earlier, one evening Helena's actor friends had called her, they had a football team and were short of players and asked if Jörgen, her partner, could play for them. He phoned me and asked if I felt like coming out. I did. On a soft shale pitch somewhere outside Stockholm, in a sort of industrial area, it was cold and dark, the floodlights a bright yellow. I hadn't kicked a ball for many years and was put at left back, where I could cause the least damage. The team consisted entirely of actors, and it was comical, at half-time most of them talked about their own performances, what they had or hadn't done, with no regard for the team as a whole, in a cacophony of egocentricity. The coach, a man of around thirty who played at center half, gave his instructions in a dark Stockholm accent. He and the other center half came over to me after the game, it turned out they were both Norwegians. The coach's name was Axel, an Østlander, the other was Henrik, a Kristiansander, they had gone to acting school in Stockholm together and both lived in the capital. Karl Ove, Henrik said. You wouldn't be Knausgaard, would you? Yes, I said, and they laughed because they had both read my books and they must have thought the odds of bumping into me out here on a muddy field on the edge of Stockholm in the autumnal gloom were fairly low. I continued to play for them and then one Saturday Axel texted me, wondering whether I would like to go to his son's birthday party. I was sure he had made a mistake, sent the text to the wrong person, and I politely declined. But it hadn't been a mistake, he still got in touch now and then, we met a few times outside the football context, and when he and Linn came on the occasion of Vanja's second birthday, Linn was surprised to see a poster for a short film for which Linda had written the script and asked how it came to be hanging there. It transpired that Linn had produced the film. Their children were the same age as ours and we started seeing each other regularly.

Axel was a friendly, considerate person, but on the football field I had seen another side to him, an aggression and a drive that seemed alien to his usual self; once we had been to see a football match in Råsunda, on the way back we were in the crowd catching the metro when a man sat down on the seat I was about to occupy, Axel almost flew at him in a rage. I couldn't get these sparks to tally with the person he normally was because if anything typified his personality it was gentleness, and it was genuine, an innate quality from what I could see, not something he had learned. Linn was also considerate, although inside her there was an edge too, she wasn't afraid to be direct and she couldn't care less what others thought about what she said or did. As far as family life was concerned, they were on a different plane from us, they had a house and a car and order in their finances. She worked as a TV producer for SVT; he worked as a freelance actor. They had met on set while making an ad; that was one of the first things he told me. Sometimes we had lunch at my regular place next to the office, often we got together over the weekend, and every Monday during the season when we played a match. We kept in touch even after we moved to Malmö and they moved to Oslo, though the intervals between seeing each other were becoming longer and longer. Axel and Linn were generous sorts who invited us to all kinds of things and resolved all the practical details along the way. One Easter they asked us to stay with them at a mountain cabin his father owned, and once they invited us to Berlin, where he had been given the use of an apartment. We hadn't invited them to anything, how could we, there were no cabins or houses in our family and we didn't have the money to rent one. But they didn't seem to keep a tally.

After eating we flopped down on the sofa with a beer to wait for Linn to return so that we could go out. I was so tired that I barely knew what I was saying. It had been a terrible day. And tomorrow everything would be in the papers.

Sometime later, walking toward the center along the streets in the western part of town, the night sky was dense and star-spangled. Leaves lay under all the trees. The air was crisp, crystalline, though not cold, it still retained the heat of the day, which died away very slowly. We sat down at a table outside Tekehtopa, just by the hotel, had a couple of beers and chatted. As I had to do a reading at the Opera House the next day and the last thing I needed was a hangover, I left after an hour to go to bed. Axel accompanied me into the hotel as Silje had promised they would drop off two copies of the book when it came out, and the receptionist passed me the packet with a smile and glanced over furtively as I opened it. I signed one and gave it to Axel, said goodbye, and took the other up to my room, where I put it in my backpack, then undressed, switched on the TV, and lay watching until I could no longer keep my eyes open. At some point in the night I must have woken up and switched off the television because when I opened my eyes at around six the screen was black and silent. I showered, dressed, and went down for breakfast. All the newspapers were laid out on the table, but I gave them a wide berth, I didn't want to know. Got myself some scrambled eggs, bacon, sausages, and some bread, a little juice and a cup of tea, sat down, glanced across at the pile of newspapers. What I didn't want to see was the interviews. They were in Dagbladet Magasinet, Dagens Næringsliv, and Dagsavisen. But the reviews? I had decided not to read them. But I had to find out whether they were a catastrophe or had gone well. I had an agreement with Geir that he would text me when he'd read them, to say how they were. But it was only seven o'clock, he could be hours yet.

What the hell, a quick look at the intro couldn't hurt.

I got up and picked up Dagbladet, carefully avoiding the magazine section, flicked through to the culture pages. There it was.

I was burning inside as my eyes ran down the lines.

It looked good.

It had gone well.

I wondered if it had gone just as well in Dagens Næringsliv?

I put Dagbladet back and picked up Dagens Næringsliv instead, went to the table, did the same, avoided the interview and flipped through to the review.

This one had gone well too.

Phew.

With a cup of coffee in my hand I had a smoke outside the hotel entrance and watched the few people walking along the street at such an early hour. The sky was as blue as it had been yesterday and the sunlight was already streaming down over the roofs and spires.

The reading at the Opera House was part of a kind of book day organized by the book clubs. I didn't want to read anything from the first volume and had instead chosen a passage from the second, it was about a Rhythm Time baby class I had once been to in Stockholm, and I had selected this because I hoped it would make people laugh. I had done two readings from Book 1, the first at the invitation of Ingvar Ambjørnsen, who was the honorary resident writer at Bergen International Festival, on which occasion I chose the opening I had just written; the second was at a Litteraturhuset event, when I chose the scene where Yngve and I arrived at the house in Kristiansand. Both passages were about death, and if there was anything that dampened the atmosphere at a function it was of course a reading about death and decay, and as this was an autobiographical novel and not something I had made up I felt as though I was forcing myself and my gloomy personality on them and ruining their evening by my mere presence. After the last time at Litteraturhuset I had decided I wouldn't do it again. Hence comedy, hence the Rhythm Time scene. Book 2 was a comedy, but a comedy deep, deep below the surface. It was about a man who was trapped in his own self-delusions and a family which was also trapped in its self-delusions, and this led them into highly undignified situations, which would have resolved themselves if they had only looked at each other and said they had been deluding themselves, this is the reality and it didn't matter. But they couldn't, it was precisely this that was impossible, they did the opposite, they looked at each other and said it mattered.

The hotel was around the corner from the publishing house, and after a while I strolled over to print out the passage I was going to read; my printer at home hadn't worked. Geir Berdahl was there packing the books he was going to deliver by car with his daughter Maria, with whom I had only a passing acquaintance, I had never spoken to her. It was irritating that on the very day when the papers were full of reviews the book wasn't on the shelves, because this focus and interest lasted for only one day, by the following week all the attention would already be on the wane, unless the book was nominated for some prize or other, in which case it might be rekindled for a few days. When my debut book came out the publishers had gone for a very small print run, and when it sold out they printed another two hundred copies, no more than that, and so it went on, with the result that for the whole of December, the sole month when books actually do sell in Norway, it wasn't in any of the bookshops. Sales figures in themselves meant nothing to me, but money did, especially now that there were five of us in the family and the royalties from the books were our only source of income apart from my scholarship.

I put the printout in my backpack, said goodbye to Geir and Maria, and walked down to the Opera House. I hadn't seen it before, except for its anonymous façade from the railway station and, standing in front of it, I was surprised. It really was a magnificent edifice. All that white stone gleaming, ablaze almost, in the sun next to the cool blue sea from which it rose. I walked up onto the roof, surveyed the harbor area as I smoked a cigarette, an hour to go to the reading. Leaning against a wall I took out a half-liter bottle of Pepsi Max, had a swig, got out my phone, and called Linda. She had packed and would soon be off to Kastrup, she said. My mother had also arrived; right now they were with the children at a playground. I said I was nervous and that it would be wonderful to go out in Prague this evening. She wished me luck and we hung up. I switched off the phone and put it in my backpack. Once when I was being interviewed onstage it had rung and the audience laughed; it was just the sort of thing audiences laugh at. Audiences wanted to laugh, they zeroed in on anything comical and always burst into laughter when there was something funny, almost irrespective of how trivial. An audience over a certain size has its own dynamics and its own mind-set regardless of the individuals that constitute it. Something they would never have laughed at on their own, they would never have found amusing in a million years because it was so petty, could, in an auditorium, generate howls of laughter. And when they sat there in silence, this silence could be indicative of a variety of very distinct moods. Boredom, indifference: then it was as though what was said dispersed and disappeared like smoke. Responsiveness, interest: what was said hung in the air and it was as though there were a greediness in the room, which was a fantastic and exhilarating response to have. I often read the same texts, but the atmosphere is never the same; sometimes a particular passage makes everyone laugh, at others there is total silence. A scene can be explosive one evening and appear flat and meaningless the next. Some of this depends on my delivery: as I come across as very serious, and occasionally also somber, it's as if my very presence seems to stifle the comedy, whereas when I am able to chat first the laughter comes more easily. But for the most part it comes down to the audience, its particular makeup and the atmosphere of the venue.

I threw my cigarette down, stepped on it, and made my way toward the entrance. The plaza outside was thronged with people. Right in front of the door I bumped into Vetle Lid Larssen. We had the same publisher once, but I had never spoken to him or even said hello. So what should I do? Pretend I hadn't seen him? That might seem haughty or dismissive. But greeting him didn't seem natural either; we didn't know each other.

"Hi," I said.

"Hi," he said. "Congratulations on the reviews!"

"Thank you," I said.

"See you," he said, slipping inside the door. I followed him, plowed my way through all the people, located a young woman who appeared to have something to do with the event, she did, just a minute, she said, and went to find someone else who took me backstage. Narrow corridors with black walls, sudden high-ceilinged areas full of wires and hoisting equipment, doors all over the place, and then a makeshift room behind some half-walls where we were to wait before going onstage. A bowl of fruit, some pots of coffee, and bottles of mineral water. Cathrine Sandnes, who was the emcee, was there, she gave me a hug and said something and laughed, she was one of those rare people who laughed all the time, and Dag Solstad, who was going to read after me, sat there with the head of a book club and some others I didn't know. I said hello and poured myself a coffee. I asked Cathrine how her children were doing, she told me a bit about them and showed me some photos on her phone, she asked after mine, I said they were fine. I couldn't remember when I had met her first, probably it had been with Espen and Frederik, I seemed to recall we were watching a football match and she was there, and someone told me she was the Norwegian champion in some martial art. She worked for Dagsavisen then. She had also interviewed me once; afterward, walking to the hotel, I remember we had talked about the mysterious expression "in form" – the immensely successful phase sportsmen and -women can experience when all the shackles fall off them – with respect to writing. As a writer you can also go through a phase where nothing works and then all of a sudden you are in the zone, and everything works. It is all in your head. Football, writing, tae kwon do. Cathrine was now editor in chief at Samtiden, married to Aslak Sira Myhre, whom I remembered from Bergen, initially I knew him only from a distance, as an ultra-left-wing student politician, afterward I got to know him better because he had been Tore's best friend when they were growing up in Stavanger and was an obvious model for the most important minor protagonist in Tore's novels about Jarle Klepp. I had written an essay for Samtiden and had a little to do with Cathrine then. Over the years we had run across each other a few times and she hadn't changed in the slightest. Her most prominent character trait, at least the one that was most obvious, was that she was completely fearless.

She wasn't affected by the terrors and tensions that abound in the art world. As was the case now, standing in the midst of a crowd of people, chatting and laughing with them on all sides.

She led me onto the stage, explained what she had planned: first of all, a brief introduction, then I would come on, stand there, she would ask a witty question about the title, and then I would read.

The blood drained from my head as I stood on the stage gazing at the empty auditorium in front of me. My face must have gone white with fear. We went back through the corridors and into the makeshift dressing room. I poured myself another cup of coffee, glanced warily at Dag Solstad, who was sitting on a chair a couple of meters away. I had met him several times before, most often in a publishing-house context, but I had never managed to say a word to him, not even about the weather. I wasn't afraid of him, it wasn't that, it was that I couldn't view him as a man of flesh and blood. He was already a writer when I was born, and not only that, he had already been hailed as the greatest writer of his generation. Throughout my life he had been "Dag Solstad," the great writer; so as a social fixture he was as well established as Gjensidige Forsikring insurance, the Ringnes Brewery, or the cup final, a status which incidentally he shared with Jan Erik Vold, who had also always been there, on TV and in the classroom, they were in a sense representatives of the writing fraternity, iconic images – the mild-looking man with the strange voice who read the poem about the loaf of bread and the bespectacled man with the unruly hair who mumbled and snuffled when he was asked about something. So there was an immense distance to be covered when I grew up and started reading their books in earnest, as works relevant to the present, and the wonderful part about this, when the iconic image breathes with life because you suddenly invest yourself and your experience and knowledge in it, can be compared to how your perception of your own parents changes when you become a parent yourself: suddenly their distant lives, their incomprehensible behavior, reflect something deeply human and universal, and they come to life. In this way "Dag Solstad" had come to life, but not as a person, only as a writer, for if there was one thing that characterized Dag Solstad's literary work it was that he wrote iconic books; they expressed something unclear and invisible in such a way that they became clear and visible, not just once but again and again. So the unmasking of "Dag Solstad" that the reading of his books brought about led only to another mask, for as icons the books weren't a reflection of the writer but the writer's time, and perhaps also contributed to forming it. One of his books opens with a person who is alone and out of shame raises his hands to his face. Reading that, I thought I had done a much better job and with greater profundity in my debut novel, in which the main character is constantly ashamed and no stranger to the gesture and impulse that occasions the shame. In my hubris I even suspected Dag Solstad of having lifted it from my book. Back then I hadn't understood the value of the iconic, it was too alien to me, nothing in my life and writing coalesced to form an image, everything overflowed its banks. Now I understand. The iconic is the pinnacle of literature, its real aim, which it is constantly striving to achieve, the one image that contains everything within but still lives in its own right. The lonely man raising his hands to his face: the shame. The man who sets the scene for his own paralysis: inauthenticity. And the most pregnant and terrible of all of Solstad's images: the father witnessing his son accepting money to drive his friends around. That must be why Solstad was so preoccupied with Thomas Mann and Henrik Ibsen in his later books: they are the last great iconic writers. Mann's sanatorium in The Magic Mountain is the perfect setting for a novel, it is both a symbol and a place, in the same way that Peer Gynt and Brand are symbols and characters. All literature wants to go there, to the one essential symbol that says everything and is at the same time everything. Heart of Darkness, Moby-Dick, Riverrun.

I lifted my cup to my mouth and sipped the hot coffee, then lowered it as, to my mortification, tiny brown drops were running down the outside. I looked out at the auditorium, took another sip, wanting to chat with "Dag Solstad," but I didn't know about what. Once someone had said I just wanted to chat with the greats; ever since then I had been reminded of that remark whenever I was standing next to one of the "greats." Was it true? Did I want to chat only with them? Not only perhaps, but I had to admit I did want to, they had a magnetic appeal, being in a position to say something to them was a privilege, that was how it felt. On the other hand, it was also fawning. There was no doubt about it. Fawning and crawling.

I sought his eyes and met them.

"Do you have any opinions on Peter Handke?" I said.

It sounded a bit abrupt. But "Dag Solstad" didn't appear to notice. He shook his head and said actually he didn't. He had read some of his books, but that was a long time ago and he couldn't say he was particularly interested in Handke, no.

"I'm in the middle of reading a fantastic book by him now," I said. "My Year in the No-Man's-Bay, it's called. Have you read it? Think it came out in the eighties or maybe the nineties."

"No, I haven't. It's good, you say, is it?"

"Yes, it is."

That was it. There were a lot of people around, conversation flowed, people drifted in and out and soon it was time to go onstage. Solstad didn't move, he wasn't on until half an hour after me, and when the technician had attached a mic to me I stood behind the curtain, beside the flashing mixing desk, waiting for the applause to die down and Cathrine to introduce me. Then I walked across the stage, she asked her question, the audience laughed, I waffled something trite, she took a few steps back, and I started reading. After I had finished I went backstage, removed the mic and hurried into the foyer, which was still full of people, crossed the plaza, and dashed up onto the footbridge, also crowded, in some places so packed that I had to stand and wait, until, on the other side by the train station, I found a taxi and gave the driver the address of Thorenfeldt's photographic studio in west Oslo. We drove through the glittering, sunlit autumn streets and after I had paid and got out I saw a man waving at me from a doorway around fifty meters away. I half ran over, was led into the studio where Hanne Ørstavik and Ingvar Ambjørnsen were waiting, the former wearing a vintage dress, from the 1920s or the 1930s perhaps, and the latter a white dinner jacket with a white top hat. Thorenfeldt himself appeared and shook hands, he was a portly man who obviously laughed a lot, at least he was now. I was given a pile of clothes, all white, stepped into a cubicle and put them on. The trousers were much too big, they hung off me like a sack, but with suspenders they were fine, the assistant said when I emerged, and away we went. We lined up for the photo, Thorenfeldt played some Frank Sinatra at full blast, laughed and shouted as we three squeezed together and posed, with and without hats, and finally Hanne was given confetti, which she threw into the air as a kind of finale. It was all over in ten minutes. The photos were for a chain of bookshops, as far as I could make out, and at first I had been dubious, which was my way of declining, it meant nothing to me since I had my literary credibility to think about, which this would undermine at a stroke. I wasn't that type of writer, I had thought, but then I allowed myself to be persuaded after all, it was important for the book, and "no" was one of the words I found hardest to say, I was too weak for that word, the thought of disappointing someone always outweighed any consideration of my credibility, so there I was, in the studio of a photographer who was used to working with celebrities, dressed up as some kind of literary revue artiste. And it had been fun. It had been fun to dress up, it had been fun to have my photo taken, it had been fun to stand there posing amid the laughter and blare of music. It helped that I was doing it with Ingvar Ambjørnsen and Hanne Ørstavik, I respected them both, and if they had signed up it couldn't have been that bad. It was a sellout. Yes, it was, but what had I actually sold? My soul. But I had already lost that anyway.

After the photo shoot I had a cup of coffee with Hanne at a nearby sidewalk café. We first met in the mid-nineties, I had done an interview with Rune Christiansen for Vagant, and he had invited me to the Oktober summer party. Espen was there, he was an Oktober writer, Mom's brother Kjartan was there, he was an Oktober writer, and at the table where I was assigned a place Hanne was there, who was also an Oktober writer. We chatted during the meal, but as I felt so inferior, being the sole nonwriter there, I moved to Espen's table as soon as we had finished eating, and stuck close to him for the rest of the evening. The next time I met Hanne was just after I had made my debut and she reminded me of that evening, of how impolite I had been, moving away from her as though she wasn't worth talking to. Since then we had met at various literary events at the publishing house, after

I had moved from Tiden to Oktober. She was a novelist to her fingertips, uncompromising with regard to her books, and incorruptible. Rare qualities, both of them. As a person she was sensitive and there was something vulnerable about her, and perhaps it was the impossible equation, the uncompromising, incorruptible essence versus the openness to impressions of the world that made her novels so perfectly rounded and yet so testing. We had never talked at length apart from on one occasion a few weeks earlier, at a dinner held by Oktober after a press conference, when all our social inhibitions were suddenly thrown to the wind and we got down to the nitty-gritty. I talked about what my life was really like; she talked about what her life was really like. The openness had been restricted to that moment, now we just talked about our books for the most part and after a quarter of an hour I got up, the plane would be going soon, and I took a taxi to the train station, from where I caught the express to Gardermoen, checked in at the last moment for the Copenhagen flight, and finally plumped down onto a seat, alone.

The desperate rush through the departures hall reminded me of another time when I'd had to run to catch the plane home. At that time I had been carrying Vanja. She couldn't have been more than twelve months old. I had been invited to my uncle's child's confirmation ceremony, which was to take place outside Oslo, and as Linda was pregnant with Heidi and didn't want to fly, I had gone with Vanja. I wanted to show her to the family. Everything had gone well, except on the plane home when she had screamed without interruption for half an hour, and even my suit jacket was soaked with sweat. Now, the race across the airport having jogged my memory of the previous occasion, it struck me that that was probably the last time I had seen my family. Admittedly I had seen Gunnar and his sons once since then, in Mom's garden in Jølster, but that had been only for a few minutes. The confirmation had lasted all day, and all the people I had known all my life behaved in their own idiosyncratic ways, which I knew so well. The dynamics between the two brothers, all the wordplay, all the hackneyed phrases. Their children, who were becoming adults. Representing Dad and having Vanja with me made the occasion an enjoyable experience.

Holding Vanja in my arms, sensing the person she was, filled me completely as I sat in the stationary plane waiting for our turn to take off. My love for her seemed to collect in one point, overwhelming and uncontrollable, it hurt so much tears came to my eyes, and then it relinquished its hold on me and sank back into the depths as the plane began to taxi onto the runway. The sun was low, the shadows were long, I leaned back and closed my eyes in an attempt to doze. Of course it was impossible; too much had happened in the past two days. But now it was all about getting off this plane, onto the next, off again, a taxi to the city center, and then I would have a different world around me.

When we were up in the air and the Østland forests beneath us were becoming more and more distant, the passenger in the seat next to me, a woman in her late twenties or early thirties, blond with muscular arms, picked up Dagbladet, took out the magazine section, and started flipping through it. As soon as I saw that, I turned away and looked out the window. A few seconds later, in a diversionary move intended to appear as if I was opening the air vent above the seat, I glanced at the page she was holding steadfastly in front of her and discovered to my despair that she was reading the article about me. I glimpsed a photo of me before turning away again with my cheeks burning. She couldn't have realized that the man who was featured in the interview she was reading was in the seat beside her, otherwise she would have looked at me and said so, wouldn't she? If the krone dropped during the flight she would know why I had turned away so obviously and the situation would be embarrassing for both of us; she would have unmasked me, I would have been unmasked. But I couldn't tap her on the shoulder either and say: That's me you're reading about! That would have sounded completely stupid. If she had kept flipping through, it wouldn't have been so bad, but now she was reading every single word while I sat beside her, only a few centimeters away, with my head averted as far as possible. When she finished the interview I would have to continue hiding because the predicament was not over, even if the reading was.

She spent at least ten minutes on the interview, I was able to confirm after several sidelong glances at the silly magazine. It was odd that she didn't notice as my body must have been giving off all sorts of signals. But no, while I stared out the window for the long hour from Oslo to Copenhagen she quietly occupied herself, reading a bit, eating a bit, reading a bit more. Oh, what a relief it was when the plane landed, came to a halt, and she got up and went down the aisle and I could finally straighten my neck, breathe out, and relax.

Linda was waiting in the arrivals hall when I came out. She had dressed smartly and was happy. We kissed, checked in, and spent the hour before the plane departed having a beer in the café where I had been that morning. It felt decadent, I never drank when I traveled because there was always something I had to do on my arrival, and Linda and I seldom drank together anymore either because we always had children around us.

It was a feeling of freedom. For the next two days we could do exactly what we wanted. No children, no writing, no readings, no interviews. Just us two. The cloud hanging over everything, the book I had written about us that Linda hadn't read yet, I cast from my mind. There is a time for everything. She would get the manuscript on our return. For the moment she knew nothing and the weekend would be spent within that nothing.

The sun had gone down when we boarded the plane. The atmosphere in the bright cabin was quite different from what it had been on the Oslo-bound plane because the language on all the signs and advertising stickers was foreign, the faces of the cabin attendants another type, but also because of the darkness which, as we rose through the air, soon shut us in and defined the space with such incredible clarity: here we were, high above the ground, on our way down Europe to one of its old capitals while nameless, unknown towns lay like luminous jellyfish in a sea of darkness beneath us, and what the sharply defined space said was "travel," in the same way that a train compartment said travel, a ship's cabin said travel and for that matter a cabin on a zeppelin said travel. Not travel as movement but travel as mythology. Travel in the twenties and thirties; travel in the fifties and seventies. And not

Europe in the sense of geography, but Europe as mythology. It was fantastic that the towns had been there in the Middle Ages, indeed that they had been what was the Middle Ages, what was the Renaissance, what was the Baroque, not to mention the world wars in the previous century, it was fantastic that they were still there, scattered across the continent beneath us, and they were so different, had such different auras and meanings, permeated by time, each in its own way. London and Paris, Berlin and Munich, Madrid and Rome, Lisbon and Oporto, Venice and Stockholm, Salzburg and Vienna, Bucharest and Manchester, Budapest and Sarajevo, Milan and Prague, just to name a handful. Prague, it was Golem, the man-made man, and it was Kafka. It was the Faustian Middle Ages and the nineteenth-century dual monarchy, it was the communist 1950s and the capitalist 2000s of the unsophisticated and vulgar Eastern European variety.

What was the difference between reality and our perception of it? Did reality exist, was it beyond our reach? For perception-less reality was also a perception.

What did the moods and impressions these names evoked mean? They meant nothing. But neither did our lives, if we took away our perceptions of them.

The hotel was by the river, beside the old bridge, and our room had windows overlooking the water. It wasn't luxurious, no minibar or TV, but it was classy in the same way that the old hotels along the fjords in Vestland are classy, those that have retained the interior from the turn of the previous century, as they had done here, unless they had recreated it, that is. We put down our luggage and went out to eat. It was nearly ten, so we chose the first – and the best – restaurant, on the other side of the bridge, with tables along the river illuminated by small lantern-like lights. It was hard to grasp, at least for me, that we were here, beside the black flowing water with the old bridge arched over it, the castle towering up behind us, it was as though everything that moved around us was somewhere else, even when we were crossing the bridge a short time before and had our feet on it, that had been the feeling.

We ordered a bottle of red wine and clinked glasses. Linda's dimly lit face blazed in the darkness, her eyes glittered, she placed her hand on mine and a warmth spread through me. The food arrived, we ate, from behind us came the sound of Norwegian voices and the feeling that we were completely free was gone, suddenly there were people who could see us. Linda noticed the change in me and asked what was wrong. I said there were Norwegians here and that I was beginning to weigh everything I said on their scales, hear everything with their ears. She said that sounded terrible and I had to stop doing it. I said I would try. Then I told her about what had happened on the plane. She laughed at me. We paid and wandered around the town before going back to the hotel. The next morning we woke up early and were unable to sleep in, even though we tried, our circadian rhythms were in tatters after five years with small children, instead we had breakfast and went out into the morning-empty, Sunday-quiet town which was slowly getting warmer, had a coffee at a café and on our way back a few hours later we bought tickets for a ballet that evening, Tchaikovsky's Swan Lake, which we thought must be wonderful here in old Eastern Europe. In the evening we dressed up, I put on a white shirt, a tie, and suit, Linda a dark dress, and then we left for the theater. I imagined marble staircases, balconies clad with red plush, men in tailed coats and women in white evening gowns. I had found instructions for how to get to the theater on the computer in the lobby, but I didn't print them out, and when we arrived in the area we walked around for a while, unable to find the street. With only ten minutes before the performance was due to start we began to run. Linda asked a woman in a kiosk where the theater was, she didn't understand, Linda showed her the ticket, she pointed, we set off in the direction she indicated, nothing, we came into an open square, no theater, we crossed it and ran down a narrow street where there was nothing but apartment buildings, turned, ran back, crossed the square again, Linda asked someone else, this time a fat man with a dog, he spoke English and said it was in the parallel street, we rushed off in that direction, found the name of the street, ran up and stopped, there it was at last. But instead of the large palatial theater I had imagined, something like the opera house in Proust's novel, we were standing in front of a building that looked more like a cinema of the run-down, lugubrious variety. Surely this couldn't be it? But, yes, it was, the name on the elegant, ornate tickets we had been given matched the name above the door. We entered, and the shabby music-hall feel of the building became even stronger. The auditorium was small and dowdy, the stage tiny, there was no orchestra pit, let alone an orchestra. The audience was meager and seemed for the most part to consist of disoriented tourists, but not as disoriented as the two of us, who had dressed up and were attracting interested looks as we made our way along the row of folding chairs to find our seats. Oh no, I said to Linda, what have we got ourselves into here? The dancing might still be all right, she said, taking my hand as we sat waiting. Around us the lights dimmed, but not much, and in front of us, on the stage, the lights came on at the same time as someone put on the CD they were going to dance to. The music came from two loudspeakers on a stand on either side of the stage, and after a few minutes without anything much happening two young ballet dancers jumped out, they must have been sixteen or seventeen, probably students, and from their dancing bodies came nothing, all their movements seemed to stay inside them as they gyrated and jumped and sallied back and forth across the stage, every step a thud on the floor. I was none too fond of ballet, I was there for Linda's benefit and squirmed with embarrassment at all the awkwardness and lack of grace unfolding in front of our eyes. Linda had spent so much time in front of the mirror preening herself. It was the only full evening we had in Prague and we were going to spend it here of all places. I looked at her. She looked at me. Then she smiled. I think it's the worst show I've ever seen, she whispered. And that's saying quite a bit, I've seen a lot of bad dancing. Shall we go, I whispered. Let's wait until the interval, she whispered. And we did. We found a bar instead, where we sat for the rest of the evening chatting and getting drunk. The next morning we slept in, had lunch somewhere at the foot of the hill where the castle stood, in a courtyard, and then we walked up to the castle, visited an art exhibition, and afterward went to an outdoor café on the margins of the castle precinct, overlooking a forest below. It was warm, like in summer, we both had a cold beer, suddenly she took out a pen and wrote down the song she had sung at my fortieth, six months earlier, after which she passed it to me. I had asked for it some months ago but had forgotten. I'd had a party at home, there were twenty-odd guests and I had let it be known that I didn't want any speeches. Espen, Tore, and Geir had taken no notice, so when Linda stood up I was expecting another speech.

"Vanja once said there are no grown-ups in this family," she said. "But I think you're well on the way to becoming one and I hope I'm not far behind. But I'm not going to make a speech. I was thinking of bursting into song. And as I never learned to play an instrument I was thinking of playing the ukulele."

She took a few steps back, and when she reappeared she was holding a ukulele. I knew she couldn't play and feared the worst. But it transpired one of the parents at the nursery school had taught her, she had learned the chords of a song, and whenever I had been out during the previous month she'd practiced.

So there she stood, playing and singing a song to me. It was the one she handed to me in the castle café and I read it with tears rolling down my cheeks.

Only once I saw that man
My eyes were transfigured
He moved like the wind
Swift and bold, master of his fate
He looked at me and smiled
He saw me blush and smiled
And he walked on by
But he did walk by

Then I saw the man again
My eyes were transfigured
He beamed like the sun
He was to turn my life around
He touched me and smiled
He touched my hand and smiled

And he didn't walk on by
No, he didn't walk by

The days have turned to years
And my eyes are transfigured
Such a man, such a man is he
A touch of his hand made my life complete
He looked at me and smiled
I saw his lion heart and smiled
Karl Ove, my beloved
I love you so, I love you so.

I had never even entertained the idea of having a party on my fortieth; it had been absolutely out of the question. But in early autumn the previous year, September 2008 to be more precise, when we had been visiting Yngve in Voss, Linda and Yngve had brought up the subject. We had been sitting on the veranda in the evening, after the children had gone to bed, each of us with a glass of red wine in hand. The sky above us was pitch black and ablaze with stars. The air was cold and clear.

"We've been talking about your fortieth birthday," Linda said, looking at me in the faint light from the veranda door.

"Have you?" I said.

"Yes, we have. We've decided you should have a big party and celebrate it properly."

"Invite everyone you know," Yngve said. "And maybe Lemen and Kafkatrakterne could play."

"But that's the last thing I want," I said. "I couldn't imagine anything worse."

"We know that," Linda said. "But you've been hiding out for long enough, haven't you?"

"But there's nobody to invite."

"There are lots of people," Yngve said. "You know more people than you imagine. If you give it some thought."

"Possibly," I said, looking at Linda. "If it were up to me I'd celebrate it with you, like any normal birthday. That's nice, too. You come in with candles and presents and sing 'Happy Birthday.' That's enough celebration for me."

"Of course," Linda said.

"But this isn't for you," Yngve said. "It's to give everyone you know a chance to make a fuss over you. And to have a party. If you send out invitations in plenty of time so people can plan, book hotels, and planes, and so on, I'm sure everyone'll come. I'm definitely up for it anyway."

"That I don't doubt," I said with a smile. "But you didn't celebrate your own fortieth."

"And I regret it."

"So what do you say?" Linda asked.

"No," I answered.

Something about the suggestion did appeal to me though, it was true what Linda had said, I'd been hiding out for long enough.

Why had I done that?

It was a form of survival. In my terrible twenties I had tried to involve myself in the life around me, normal life, the one everyone lived, but I'd failed, and so strong was my sense of defeat, this glimpse of shame, that little by little, unbeknown to myself as well, I shifted the focus of my life, pushed it further and further into literature in such a way that it didn't seem like a retreat, as though I were seeking a refuge, but like a strong and triumphant move, and before I knew what was happening it had become my life. I didn't need anyone else, life in my study and the family was sufficient, actually, more than sufficient. It wasn't because I had problems with the social world that I withdrew from, no, it was because I was a great writer or wanted to be one. That solved all my problems and I thrived on it.

But if it was true that I was hiding, what was I frightened of?

I was frightened of other people's judgments of me, and to avoid this I avoided them. The thought that anyone would like me was a dangerous thought, perhaps the most dangerous one for me. It never occurred to me, I didn't dare think it. I didn't even think that Mom might actually like me.

Or Yngve or Linda. I assumed they didn't, not really, but that the social and family bonds we were entangled in nonetheless meant that they had to see me and listen to what I had to say.

If I had been responsible for only myself there would have been nothing to consider. I would manage whatever the circumstances. But I had three children with Linda and didn't want them to grow up in a home that was hidden away, didn't want them to believe that hiding was an acceptable way of engaging with the world. All I could give them was what I was giving them now, and this wasn't given through what I said but what I did. I wanted them to be surrounded by people, I wanted them to become independent and fearless, able to develop their full potential, by which I mean to be as free as possible within the unfree limits of this society. And, most important of all, I wanted them to feel secure in themselves, to like themselves, to be themselves. At the same time they had the parents they had, I thought, and we couldn't change our personalities in any fundamental way, which would have been both senseless and catastrophic: having two parents who pretended to be something they weren't would obviously just bring more misery. This was about our living conditions. They were fixed, but not immutable. The way I had behaved during the first three or four years of having children, when, much too often, I took out my frustrations on them, must have affected their self-esteem, the one thing in them you, as a parent, mustn't fuck up. I had got out of this, it hardly ever happened anymore, we never argued in front of them now and I never lost my temper, but I said a silent prayer almost every day that this hadn't left any marks, that what I had done wasn't beyond redress. I imagined that their self-esteem was a beach, I had left my footprints there, but then the waves washed ashore, the sun shone, the sky was blue, and the water, so fantastic at adapting to its environment, covered everything, erased everything, salty and cold and wonderful.

I thought about this, but I knew I should never intervene directly, I should never let these concerns, which all parents feel, take on a form that they would notice and react to. Vanja wasn't even a year old when she began to close her eyes if strangers visited, and where did that come from? Was it genetic, a shyness so great that it forced her to shut out everything? Or had she picked it up from us, the atmosphere in the house, the way I behaved with other people? It continued, she hid from strangers, and if she couldn't do that she closed her eyes, the last occasion at the age of three and a half years old in the stroller one afternoon, we met one of the parents from school, Vanja slid down and pretended she was sleeping. It didn't matter, but it bothered me nonetheless, I just wanted her to be happy. The worst that could happen was that she noticed my unrest. I shouldn't tie them to me, shouldn't allow my concerns to be noticeable, I should just try to fix everything quietly. I had to snap out of my prevarications, my evasive looks, my reclusiveness, my life closeted in the study.

Linda had much of the same in her. But with her it was changeable: an introverted, depressed, and passive period in the daytime when she was unable to do anything but lie on the sofa and watch undemanding films was followed by an extroverted, enthusiastic, and very active period when she suddenly would swing the children around as if nothing in the world could be more natural. So there were two of us with problems adjusting to our surroundings. A mother and a father. Their mother and father.

When we got married, in the spring of 2007, the wedding had been as minimal as possible. Linda's maid of honor, Helena, my best man, Geir, and his girlfriend Christina, Linda's mother, Ingrid, and my mother, Sissel. Five people attended our wedding in the town hall, lasting two minutes, plus Vanja and Heidi. An hour later only five people sat around the table we had booked in Västra Hamnen and ate with us. No speeches, no dancing, no fuss. That was how I wanted it, I hated being the center of attention, even with people I knew.

Did Linda want it like that?

She said she did, and I believed her, but later I realized that she might have wanted a bigger wedding. For me the fact that we were marrying was the most important; for her the emphasis was more on the way we did it.

In the evening we went to Copenhagen without the children, stayed at the Hotel d'Angleterre, had dinner at a nearby fish restaurant, and the next day flew with the children to the Canary Islands, Linda pregnant with John, and spent two weeks there, at a terrible holiday center for Scandinavians where they showed the Norwegian nine o'clock news on TV in the bars and sold Dagbladet in the lobby. We arrived absolutely exhausted, schlepped the enormous pile of luggage, double stroller to the waiting buses, the children hungry and thirsty and snarling with irritation, drove through the barren, desert-like landscape, from which the holiday bunkers and shopping malls had extracted all hope, and arrived an hour later at the place where we were going to stay. Rows of two-story concrete blocks, a parched lawn, asphalt, and two big hotels, all inside high fences, next to a pile of rocks, full of Scandinavians and Brits, this was the location for our honeymoon. I was so wound up with frustration and Linda was so exhausted that she began to cry when I growled at her for not being able to find the key when we were standing outside the door. Vanja got angry with me; I shouldn't talk to Mommy like that. Heidi looked frightened. We went inside, the two rooms were dark, but there was a balcony, which was something at least. I ventured out to buy some food, close by there was a sort of supermarket. When I returned Heidi and Vanja were in their swimming suits. For them this was a fairy tale come true, so, I realized, if I pulled myself together, they would be happy.

For us it was anything but a fairy tale. In fact, the very antithesis. There was nothing enchanting about it, there was no magic, not so much as a hint of allure. We fell into a rhythm: out of bed at half past five when Heidi woke up, play a movie on the laptop to kill the first uneventful hours, shop for breakfast when the extortionate supermarket opened, eat, go down to the pool and swim with the children until lunch, have lunch in the restaurant there, which catered for several hundred customers and served hamburgers, sausages, and spaghetti, with waiters who hated us, then take Heidi home for a nap while one of us went with Vanja and sat in a café drinking coffee while she drew with crayons and ate ice cream. Go swimming again when Heidi woke up, play for a while in one of the two small playgrounds, eat at one of the four restaurants, and then take part in the evening entertainment for the children. This was provided by a happy young Swede, maybe nineteen years old, who played songs on a stereo that the children were supposed to sing along to, he threw in a few comments about a clown coming later and asked if they were enjoying themselves. The clown was the star turn, he came, danced around, and handed out lollipops to everyone, then he was gone. A couple of times we took the children to the Teddy Bear Club, they were too young to be left on their own and too shy to do anything but stare at the young person dressed up as a teddy bear or draw pictures.

One evening toward the end of the first week there was to be a birthday party for the clown and all the children were invited. Vanja who, along with Heidi, stared wide-eyed at the clown every evening, and didn't see that behind the mask was a Swedish kid with, at best, one semester of drama under his belt, was really looking forward to the party. She put on her nicest clothes and went there with her mother full of excited anticipation while I strolled with Heidi along a path beside the sea. We had arranged to meet up at the evening event. Heidi sat calmly in the stroller looking into the distance. Her eyes were large, in photos her face was all cheeks and eyes, in character she was gentle and outgoing. When she was born Vanja clung to her mother with a passion and Heidi was left to me, I carried her around the apartment, first the one in Stockholm, then the one in Malmö, so often that she never really weaned herself off it, she still wanted to be carried. I wanted it too, there were few things I liked more than having her in my arms, and even if I knew she should walk as much as possible, to become independent and self-reliant, all it took was a pair of outstretched arms for her to be back. As was the case this afternoon as well. With the stroller under one arm, Heidi in the other I walked toward the café on the headland, only twenty meters or so above the breakers, which both she and I stared at hypnotically as we passed. At the café she had an ice cream, and the concentration she ate it with was a relief because no matter how close I felt to her there was always an element of self-consciousness or perhaps even shyness in my relationship with her, which was also true of Vanja when I was on my own with her, just different, as she was older and more verbal. It felt as though I always had to perform with her, we couldn't just walk in silence, so I filled it with little comments and questions. What a relief when she laughed! Only for the pressure to return in the ensuing silence. All this was emotion, but rationally I knew it was OK to go through quiet periods with your children, that they absolutely did not have to be entertained all the time, they had to learn it didn't matter if nothing happened, and that expectations of something special didn't come from them but from me.

What kind of person is shy with his own children? And what does it do to the children?

Getting really close to Heidi, which I did this evening when she suddenly placed her soft cheek against mine and smiled, was too much to endure. I walked faster and almost ran down the narrow asphalt path beneath the tropical trees, the wind from the Atlantic gentle and fresh against my face and the lights from our holiday center glowing far ahead of us in the falling dusk.

The clown's birthday party, which Vanja had been looking forward to all week, had not been as she had imagined. At first the staff refused to allow Linda in, the whole point of the exercise was that parents would not be present, the idea was that they should have a few hours on their own, so if Linda had time for Vanja, this was not the place to be.

"They didn't want to be seen," Linda said. "They didn't want us there because it would've shown them up."

"The clown wasn't there, Daddy!" Vanja said. "He didn't go to his own birthday party."

The children had each been given a party hat and sat around a table drawing a picture for the clown's birthday. They were then given a glass of soda and a hot dog and a piece of cake, which they ate in silence. They asked the staff when the clown was coming, he would be there soon, they were told. Then they played for a while, without the clown or any real enthusiasm since they didn't know one another and despite encouragement from the staff. Vanja didn't want to join in, she sat on Linda's lap and kept asking when the clown would be coming and why he wasn't there already. Finally the party was over, they trooped out, over to the stage where all the other children were sitting waiting for the clown, who did finally make an appearance, performing his standard routine with one exception, he collected the drawings from the children who had been at his party.

Vanja didn't understand this. How could the clown not turn up for his own birthday party?

We couldn't of course tell her the truth – that the pathetic tour operators didn't give a shit about the kids and didn't want to waste resources on them – so we said that Coco, which was the clown's name, had been pleased with the drawings, and the cake had been good, hadn't it?

And so the days passed on our package tour. Even though we disliked it intensely, both of us, something developed that we only became aware of later, when we talked about it, and the atmosphere on those evenings, sitting on the balcony reading and talking while the children slept indoors, suddenly became something we longed for and would happily experience again. The lapping of the sea, the immense dark sky above us, strewn with stars, the sounds of the tropical night. I read Gombrowicz's diaries there, they were fantastic, and this merged into the world of Scandinavian strollers, worn-out parents of small children, and pee-warmed swimming pools in a strange, almost alluring way: this was life too! This is how it could be too. Embrace it! But while we were there ennui was the dominant mood apart from two moments, one when I was on a dolphin safari with Vanja, out at sea, and the beautiful creatures playfully plowed through the water just below the railing where we stood, and not only I, but Vanja too, thought it a magical sight. When we talked about it afterward it turned out that her attention had been caught as vividly by the man who, on our return journey, went white in the face, rushed to the railing, and threw up. I could still feel how she had placed her little head in my lap and fallen asleep, and the rush of pleasure it gave me. And the picture of the Knossos dolphins I had seen once in a museum on Crete came to mind, the simple but almost unbelievable joie de vivre that lay in that fresco. Such simplicity was difficult to imagine in northern European art from that period, which was ornate to a far greater degree, and in the preornate era, in the Stone Age with its simple rock carvings, the simplicity of the line drawings was only on the surface, for humans and animals were interconnected in other, profound, and to us incomprehensible ways, the thinking behind this art was ritual and magical, whereas the Knossos dolphins were only dolphins. This fact basically ripped the bottom out of the theory I had just read, and loved, because it turned one perception of the world on its head, namely, the Italian nuclear engineer and pseudo-historian Felice Vinci's idea that Homer's Odyssey actually took place in the seas between Norway, Sweden, and Denmark. Like so many others, Vinci had been puzzled that the geography in the Odyssey was so much at variance with the real geography of the Mediterranean area, even if the names were the same. Ithaca was described in a way that did not fit Ithaca as it was, and it was the same everywhere. When Vinci for some reason looked north he discovered that the geography there fit the descriptions to a tee. Aeaea was Håja in northern Norway, Thrinacia was Mosken in Lofoten, Scheria was Klepp in Rogaland, the Peloponnese was the island of Sjælland in Denmark, Naxos was the island of Bornholm, the northern part of Poland was Crete, Faros was the Swedish island of Fårö, and Ithaca was the little Danish island of Lyø. If you went to Lyø you would see Homer's description perfectly matched the topography of the island. The notion was beguiling and it couldn't be rejected out of hand either as it solved a number of problems regarding the epic poem, for instance the fact that they light a fire in midsummer, which is odd when you know how hot the days are in the Mediterranean at that time of year, or the fact that the sea is often ascribed hues that are alien to the Mediterranean as we know it but more normal in northern waters. Vinci also had an explanation for how the whole transformation from the north to the south had come about: the people Homer describes lived for a long time in the north, but then, because of the change in climate, they were forced south, down to the Mediterranean, where they simply gave places the same names they had used in their earlier home. Hence the geographical mismatches between the book's Ithaca – which was Lyø in reality – and the real Ithaca. Ithaca was "Ithaca" or New Ithaca. But what really flew in the face of the notion, I now realized, with Vanja quietly breathing on my lap and the wind blowing straight into my face, surrounded by that strangely intoxicating mix of gasoline and salt, and slightly seasick though happy nonetheless, were the cultural differences between places. It is not only people who define the culture of a place; the place itself also defines the culture of a people. There is a direct line between the Knossos dolphins and the horses in the Parthenon friezes or between the smiling kouroi and the magnificent bronze statue of a bearded man, presumably Zeus, which was found at the bottom of the sea off the coast of Greece in 1928, or between the first Doric temples and Aristotle's philosophy. I am talking about the joy of experiencing the world as it is, as it presents itself to the eye. For that is what the Greeks did, they set the world free. The radical nature of Greek art, which deals with the world as it is, with no links to any secret world or any deeper truth, can in consequence probably only be compared with the idea that man was the son of God. One of the most interesting things about the development of Greek art is how the demand for authenticity seemed to increase, as though every move to make the world more visible was bound up in a new way with the invisible, which only then was made apparent and subsequently rejected. The archaic statues, with their inscrutable smiles, were created from the same matrix, whereby the identical, nonindividual aspect is also a nonhuman dimension, and if you imagine them in front of a temple or a grave, out in the world among people and not in a museum, they must have had a formidable, intimidating effect, for the nonhuman in human form, that is death or the divine. Their time is not ours. Their place is not here. The classical statues the Greeks made some centuries later are individual through and through, with none of those frightening nonhuman qualities about them, they point neither to death nor the divine, but are wholly human. There is however a dignity and beauty about them that in a sense places them outside time, they are elevated, ideal, representatives and universal, which later generations attacked in the Hellenistic Period, when attention was focused on divergence, including its ugly or unattractive sides, and nothing was elevated, take for instance the bronze bearded boxer sitting on his own with cuts to his arms and legs and a broken nose, apparently at rest after a boxing match, his head cocked, looking to his right, scowling almost or a little aggressive, as though his peace has just been disrupted by a call or a sarcastic remark. He looks slightly stupid, but the strength and latent brutality of his body seem to eclipse that, stupidity is not what defines him. Here, in this statue, made by one Apollonius in the last century before Christ, there is nothing that points to anything beyond this particular moment, what we see is everything, nothing is hidden, neither death nor the divine, nor man as an idea or ideal, this is the world as it is, no more, no less. But is it art?

What is art?

The conflict between what we know and what we don't is played out in all art, that is what has driven it over the centuries, and that situation is never fixed, never stable, because the moment we find out something new, something else new appears of which we know nothing. In their art, the Greeks were the first to ignore completely what they didn't understand, they concentrated on what they knew. There aren't any mysteries in Greek art. The Pyramids are an enigma, but not Doric or Ionic temples. Onstage this became a theme: Sophocles's Oedipus Rex is about a man who doesn't know and about what happens to him as he is gradually enlightened and finally discovers the truth. The question of whether the tragedy lay in ignorance or knowledge is central because this was Greek culture's own great issue. But in the play there is both what Oedipus knows and what he doesn't know, and the emphasis is on his reaction to the unknown, not on the unknown itself. And Greek mythology, the whole pantheon, consisted of gods it was impossible to take completely seriously, they were too human for that, and the allure of the underworld, which is so strong in many other mythologies, not least Norse, is quite insignificant in Greek mythology, where the dead are shadows, in other words a darkness we are familiar with. What we see is what we are. But Plato, doesn't he look to a world behind this? Yes, in a way, but that world is no different, it is the same one, only stronger, as an object is stronger and more real than its shadow.

I found it difficult to imagine that an art such as Greek art could have been spawned in Polish forests or the Danish heathlands. Why, I didn't quite know. Many people have gone into this in the past, indeed I have myself read several interpretations of the southern and the northern temperament and climate by the great Swedish poet Vilhelm Ekelund, and even though it might be frowned upon to speak in these terms now, to say that culture was influenced by climate, as those who maintained this seldom did so without hailing northern clarity and simplicity as opposed to southern deviousness and peacock-like vanity, that was how it was, I thought to myself, only vice versa: clarity belonged to Mediterranean culture, lack of clarity to northern European culture. A forest where everything is hidden, everything is connected, and everything is always a sign of something else is not conducive to ideas of openness, clarity, and simplicity. That Norse culture became obsessed with ornamentation and interwovenness and American Indian culture with animals and always balked at objects in themselves is not in the least surprising and demolishes Vinci's otherwise fascinating idea that Odysseus ravaged the Skagerrak and the Baltics. This was what was going through my mind on the boat, which was full of tourists, while a voice announced over the loudspeaker that a whale had been spotted in the vicinity, but it had dived a few minutes ago and probably wouldn't resurface before we were back in the harbor. I told Vanja this when she woke up and we were about to disembark, she was disappointed, she wanted to see a whale so much, but contented herself with the thought that it had been out there with her. I praised her for going to sleep when she felt seasick, no one else had done that, I said, she was very clever, I said, and for the whole of the following year she remembered that and returned to it several times, the others hadn't gone to sleep, so they had been sick, but I went to sleep, do you remember that, Daddy?

We walked through the harbor area to the little beach in the middle of the town. I had swimming things in my backpack, but Vanja didn't feel like a dip, she wanted to go home to Linda and Heidi, so after she had polished off an ice cream in a café and I had bought her a pair of heart-shaped sunglasses we got on the bus and were soon speeding along the road, as it wound its way like a shelf around the cliffs over the sea, the sun burning high above us. Before I had paid for the sunglasses in the shop I spotted a clothes stand at the other end, and as I made my way there with them the assistant shouted, almost screamed, at me, the sunglasses, you have to pay for the sunglasses! That annoyed me because pilfering was not in my nature, to put it mildly, and I also had a child with me, so why did she think I was stealing? When I said this to her she didn't even apologize.

"Why weren't there any sharks?" Vanja asked, not looking at me, she was staring out to sea, so vast and blue and deserted, quivering with the reflections of the sun.

"I suppose they must have been somewhere else," I said. "And they might be a bit scared of dolphins, don't you think?"

I had the idea that dolphins held sway over sharks from The Phantom. He had two dolphins on the island of Eden, which pulled him along on his water skis. One of them was called Nefertiti, but the other one? Dolphi? Anyway, if sharks came, they drove them away.

"Why are they frightened of dolphins?" Vanja asked.

"I don't know," I said. "They're stronger, I think."

She accepted that. I studied her, the little head, her blue eyes, the slight squint as she stared out to sea. Was she thinking about sharks, dolphins, and whales? If she was, what were her thoughts? She was three and a half years old, her vocabulary was limited, and what she didn't know or understand was endless. How did that feel?

I smiled and tousled her hair. She was so lovely.

She looked at me seriously. Then she smiled too and looked out the window again.

Had she done that to humor me?

I stared at the craggy mountainside flashing past the windows on the right like a film. Maybe her thoughts were basic and undeveloped, but they must have filled her mind in the same way mine did. They must have been just as important for her as mine were to me. So it couldn't be the understanding that thoughts produced that was the point of them, their objective content, but just their interaction with feelings, sense impressions and consciousness. Whatever was connected with the sense of oneself. So why push your thoughts so far and measure yourself by that yardstick? Intelligent, not intelligent, brilliant, not brilliant?

That awful sales clerk.

I stretched a leg out into the central aisle and leaned back. The trip had gone well. Vanja was happy, and the unease I had felt in the morning, that she might get bored and yearn for Linda and Heidi, had completely gone.

Something important, close to me, flagged itself up.

What was it?

Something I had been thinking about.

I looked out the window.

Something out there.

The sun?

The dark blue sea?

The slightly curved horizon? The feeling of being on a planet whirling through space?

No, no. The boat we had been on, Vinci's theory about Homer.

That was it.

What was so important about that?

Let's see . . .

The bus braked sharply, I looked ahead, there was a big white semi in front of us on the bend. We backed up.

"What's the matter, Daddy?" Vanja said.

"We have to back up because of a truck," I said. "Feel like some chewing gum?"

She nodded.

"It's adult chewing gum," I said.

"Does it taste like toothpaste?" she asked.

"Yes, just like it," I said, putting one of the small tablets into her outstretched hand. Popped three in my mouth as the truck slowly passed the windows. The peppermint taste spread like a miniature storm in my mouth.

Ah, yes. It made no difference to Vinci's theory that Mediterranean art had got close to the world in its representation of it and torn it free from all fetters. If Odysseus's adventures had taken place in the north, the accounts of them need not have been written there. And was this not what constituted the battle in the Odyssey? A battle between the mythical world represented by the Cyclops, Circe who turned the crew into pigs, the song of the Sirens, in other words a magic reality, and the new, as yet unrealized, nonmagical world from which Odysseus with his reasoning powers and ingenuity comes and which he brings with him? Horkheimer and Adorno had understood this conflict as the very dialectic of enlightenment, the place where reason liberates itself, and the barbarism of the Second World War as the place where it comes crashing down again. They were clear-sighted, it was brilliant, but I had never gone along with the implicit idea of progress in it, that the enlightened world was better than the unenlightened world, reason better than unreason, perhaps only because my own thoughts were obscure, unclear, superstitious while, at the same time, intelligible and sensible. I felt the irrational was always as important, or as dominant, as the rational. Inside me all of this ebbed and flowed, and all my thoughts, even at their most precise, were invariably colored by feelings and urges. Oh, the Sirens, they also sing for us, death lures us too, the song of decay and destruction never ceases, for in it lies the new, that which is to come, this is how life is organized. We can develop culture, we can elevate it higher and higher and we can shut out the song of the Sirens. But people are not identical with the culture in which they live, although it is easy to believe they are, as we are born into it and grow up in it. A sophisticated culture has to be sustained, it requires a great effort from all and sundry, as though they are living beyond their capabilities, until the culture's structure is strong enough to carry itself, which is treacherous as a lack of effort makes the construction invisible and we merge into the culture in which we live. Then it becomes natural, it is the only option, there is no beyond anymore, which is where the Sirens are, and barbarism becomes incomprehensible, evil, nonhuman. How can a brilliant literature professor become one of the worst war criminals in the Balkans? It's a mystery! Incomprehensible!

Knut Hamsun knew this. In almost all of his novels the enchanted and disenchanted worlds lie side by side, with the insight that is gained thereby, that all of this is of no real consequence since in the end life is empty and meaningless. But this too can be celebrated, and maybe this is what his books do.

"I've finished, Daddy," Vanja said, taking the chewing gum out of her mouth. I put out a hand and she placed the gum in it. I tore off the outside of the packet, wrapped the strip of paper around the gum and put it in my pocket. Far below us lay a little town of newly built hotels and holiday homes, shimmering white in the bright sunlight.

"Is it much farther?" Vanja said.

"No," I said. "Half an hour maybe?"

"How far away is it?"

"As far as the first part of Bolibompa."

"What's Heidi been doing?"

"How should I know! I've been with you all day."

"Did she get an ice cream?"

"I would think so. But you did, too."

"Yes."

We came into a biggish town full of dirty white-brick houses, unlit neon signs, and northern Europeans in holiday mode. Sand dunes were visible between the outermost rows of houses, above them the sea, blue and calm. The last kilometers were built up all the way: houses, supermarkets, garages, hotels, a whole forest of hotels. The bus was going fast, soon we would be heading down the hill to the last bay before our hotel, where we had gone for a walk one afternoon when we could no longer stand being in the compound and found a restaurant right by the sea. The waves had foamed and crashed against the terrazo wall, the wind made everything flap and bang, the shadows were long and sharp, the connection between the light over the countryside and the slowly sinking, burning globe in the sky hard to understand. The restaurant, overlooked by a hotel, was from the fifties or maybe early sixties and already in disrepair. Both Linda and I liked it, the atmosphere of transience and slow demise was irresistible, we sat down and ordered, but the girls were restless and irritable, so it was a case of gulping down the food and getting out as fast as possible.

The sixties, that was forty years ago. Not exactly ancient history. Nevertheless, even mass tourism was lent an aura of passing time.

Up the hill, into the right-hand lane and down to the big hotel complex where we were staying.

"There are Mommy and Heidi!" Vanja shouted.

And indeed, there they were, walking up the hill, Linda with her big belly pushing the double stroller, in which Heidi sat leaning back in one of the seats with her legs dangling, wearing a brightly colored summer dress. The bus stopped, we got off, and Vanja ran up the hill to meet them. I was curious to hear what she would say, often it turned out that she had experienced quite different things from me, but this time it was just that she had seen some dolphins and had fallen asleep to stop herself being sick.

"How did it go for you?" I said, coming to a halt in front of them.

"Fine," Linda said. "We've had a good time."

"Are you tired?"

"A bit. Nothing serious. I had a nap with Heidi."

"OK. Shall we go and get something to eat?"

She nodded and we strolled down toward the center, where the restaurants and shops were. They were concentrated around a kind of patio, half covered by a roof, with a little fountain in the middle. The floor inside the shops was the same as on the patio, terra-cotta tiles, and the lack of any distinction made me feel uncomfortable, in the same way that the sight of lawn turf being laid does. We found a table in the restaurant at the top end, ordered spaghetti bolognese for the children, I had a hamburger, Linda a pizza. The sunlight glinted and glistened on the metal railings running around the restaurants. People wearing swimming trunks and suits, with Crocs on their feet, Foppatofflor in Swedish, walked to and fro beneath us, many pushing strollers. The low sound of Euro-disco music came from the speakers above our heads. Vanja banged her knife against her glass and then Heidi followed suit. I told them to stop. Children plunge into everything, sound too, it never bothers them; if you have a lot of children in one room, such as at a birthday party, they can shout and scream and laugh amid a total cacophony, a noise level that is unbearable for adults but that they don't even notice.

Over the past few years I have become more and more sensitive to noise, it was as if the slightest little bang or clink went straight to my soul, which shook and trembled, and one day it struck me it must have been the same for Dad because if there was one thing he reacted to, if there was one thing he couldn't stand, it was noise. Footsteps across the floor, doors banging, cutlery clinking against crockery, children chomping their food. Mom, on the other hand, had never been bothered by noise. Perhaps she was more at peace inside herself, perhaps she was more closed to the world, perhaps it was only that her tolerance levels were higher. But Dad really lived on his nerves, nothing was at peace inside him, one sudden noise and he exploded.

Now it was my turn.

Not so loud! No, no, no! Stop it! DO YOU HEAR ME? BE QUIET!

Vanja slipped down from her chair and crawled under the railing. Heidi followed her, and soon they were both lying on their stomachs by the fountain splashing the water with their hands. I took out a pack of cigarettes and lit up. Linda sent me a miffed look.

"I am pregnant, you know," she said. "Couldn't you at least go and sit somewhere else?"

"Take it easy," I said. "I'm going."

I got up and headed for one of the tables farthest away. If I was sensitive to noise, Linda was sensitive to smells. It was like being married to a bloodhound. In her present state smoke for her was torture. But I was still annoyed that she had been so miffed. She didn't have to be so pissed off, for Christ's sake! I had barely had a chance to have a cigarette all day. How many had I actually smoked? Three? Yes. One in the morning, one in the café with Vanja, one now.

A waiter with a tray in one hand stopped in front of our table and put down the glasses of mineral water and soda. Linda looked up at him and smiled.

Down by the fountain Vanja and Heidi were giggling. Vanja dipped her hand into the water and flicked it at her sister, whose dress was already drenched at the top.

"Vanja!" I shouted. "Calm down now!"

She looked up at me. Several other people did too.

But at least she stopped, and the next time I looked over they were hanging from the metal railing on the other side.

After eating we went to the exit at the other end of the shopping center, past the restaurants, clothes shops, and souvenir boutiques, at Vanja's request we stopped in front of a big amusement arcade with plane simulators, car simulators, war-game machines, and one-armed bandits, continued past a couple of empty retail outlets, stopped again by a long counter where tickets for activities and excursions were sold. We had talked about getting out of the compound the following day, perhaps finding a good beach somewhere. An amiable-looking man of about my age came over to us.

"Do you know of a good beach nearby?" I asked.

Yes, he did. Taking out a brochure and showing us pictures of a magnificent beach, he said it was some distance away, but there was a minibus going there the following morning. I asked how much it cost. He replied that it was free. Free? I echoed in surprise. Yes. The beach actually belonged to a hotel, it was new, and all we had to do to get the free trip and the beach chairs was to commit ourselves to viewing the hotel and promise to tell our friends about it when we got home. That was voluntary too, of course, but it would be a great favor to him if we did, he said, as he would a get a bad reputation if everyone he sent just went straight to the beach.

"Please have a look at the hotel first and then you can go to the beautiful beach."

I exchanged glances with Linda.

"What do you think? Shall we? So that we get out a bit tomorrow?'

"Sure, why not?" she said.

The salesman handed us a form, we filled in our names and address, he gave us a ticket, we said goodbye, and returned to the compound, to the fenced-in playground behind the main hotel, where we stood side by side watching our two children go down the slide and play on the swings while people in sodden swimming suits with wet towels over their shoulders came past in a steady stream on their way back from the pools. In an hour's time they would go out again, couples dressed in short-sleeve shirts and cotton dresses, red-faced from the sun and the party atmosphere, on their way to have dinner at one of the restaurants, some of them holding their children's hands, some alone. The thought that many of them probably considered being here fantastic, indeed almost like paradise, and might have saved up for ages for this very holiday, moved me, there was something wonderful about it, as well as something sad, because the place was terrible, constructed only to shovel in money from sun-starved Scandinavians, a kind of advanced form of exploiting the unwary. The worst part was what it turned me into. Was I – someone who despised all this – any better than they were? Wasn't I actually the idiot here? They were happy, I was unhappy, but we'd paid the same money.

In the evening, after the children had gone to bed, I put on my running shoes and jogged up the hill, across the footbridge to the barren lava-black plain beyond the interchange. The idea was to get into the mountains and then run a little there to see something different from roads and hotels on my holiday. I followed a narrow asphalt road. The heat rose from the ground. The sun shone onto the mountains ahead of me. There wasn't a soul in sight. I was out of shape and ran slowly. In front of me a bus rounded the bend and came toward me. As it passed I saw it was full of elderly tourists. Where on earth had they been? My breath coming in pants now, I continued upward, the road went into a tunnel, another tourist bus came toward me, the roar of the engine reverberated against the bare rock face. At the other end was a little valley. There were more buses in a large gravel parking lot by an enclosed area that turned out to contain a Western town, as I had seen them on TV when I was growing up. If I hadn't known where I was, the deserted, sun-scorched countryside and the run-down wooden buildings could have tricked me into believing this was somewhere in the Wild West and not an island in the Atlantic off the coast of Africa.

I kept running. My T-shirt was slowly getting soaked, the sun sank into the sea, and when I returned to the compound it was almost completely dark. In the hall of our apartment I opened the door to the bedroom where Vanja and Heidi lay asleep. Their regular breathing, their limp arms and legs, and their total lack of awareness to their surroundings, where almost anything could happen without them reacting, had fascinated me from my first moment with them. It was as though they lived a different life, were connected to another world – to the dark, vegetal realm of sleep. It was so obvious where they came from, the unseeing existence inside their mother's body, and they clung to it long after their birth, when they just slept and slept. Their state wasn't dissimilar to when they were awake because their hearts were beating, their blood was circulating, nutrients and oxygen were being supplied, blood corpuscles created and destroyed, in their insides fluids and organs gurgled and pulsated, and even their nerves, the lightning of the flesh, shot through their own dark pathways as they slept. The sole difference was consciousness, though even this was present in sleep, except that it was turned inward rather than out. Baudelaire wrote about it once in his diaries, I recalled, what courage it took to cross the threshold into the unknown every night.

They lived as trees live, and, like trees, they didn't know. Tousled and heavy with sleep they would open their eyes the following morning, ready for another day, without giving a second thought to the state they had been in for almost twelve hours. The world was wide open for them, all they had to do was run out into it and forget everything, as the premise for openness is forgetting. Memory leaves trails, patterns, edges, walls, bottoms, and chasms, it fences us in, ties us up, and weighs us down, turns our lives into destinies, and there are only two ways out: insanity or death.

But my children were still in the open, free stage. And then I go and obstruct them! I was strict, said no, told them off! Why was I so eager to destroy the best thing they possessed? Which they would lose anyway.

I closed the door, took off my shoes, and was about to open the bathroom door when I changed my mind and, instead of taking a shower, took a beer from the fridge and joined Linda on the balcony, where she was reading. She put her book aside when I appeared. I sat down and lit a cigarette, but my lungs, which had just put in a hard shift, weren't up to it and I coughed for a long time.

"Why don't you stop smoking, Karl Ove?" Linda said.

I scowled at her and took a swig of beer.

"I want the children to have a father for as long as possible," she continued.

"I do too," I said. "Grandma said once I'll live to be a hundred. I believe that implicitly."

At last my lungs adapted and I was able to draw the smoke deep down.

We chatted about what had happened that day and what we would do on the next. Linda was sleepy, the dual life, the child in her belly, was taking its toll, and after a while she went to bed while I sat up reading. I was reading Witold Gombrowicz's diaries, and although I hadn't exactly been looking forward to it all day, it had been at the back of my mind as a vague presentiment of something good. I underlined sections as I read, which I seldom did anymore, but so much in these diaries seemed significant to me, and that was so rare, that I kept thinking I ought to reread them to remember and reflect on later. At regular intervals I put the book down, lit a cigarette, and gazed up at the enormous vaulted sky or down at the lights from the row of bungalows or at the trees along the avenue leading to the two swimming pools whose still surfaces were not visible from where I was sitting, but the mere thought of it had a calming effect. The reflection from the street lamps lent the green of the treetops an artificial tone, as though nature here, and not just the architecture, was man-made. But my mind didn't follow my eyes, didn't take note of either shapes or colors, drunken Brits or young Scandinavian families on their way home across the lawn – it drifted off on its own, in the dark shadows of consciousness, excited about Gombrowicz, to whom it didn't give another thought, didn't muse on but treated like a dog treats its owner after a long day's loneliness. Wagging its tail, licking, barking happily. With my heart and soul I knew these writings were important and my own writing had to go in that direction, into the emerging, the developing, the ever evolving. So I had to go down beneath the surface, beneath the ideologies, which you can only stand up to by insisting on your own experience of reality, and not by denying it, for that is what we do, all the time, deny the reality we have experienced in favor of the reality we have learned, and nowhere was the betrayal of the I, the unique and individual I, greater than in art, as art has always been the privileged domain of the unique. It almost seemed as though the prerequisite for creating art was to renounce art. In which case, that would be the most difficult of all because the creation of art wasn't loaded with value beforehand, and no one, least of all the artist, could know whether what was produced was just shit or something original and priceless. In the last years of his life Van Gogh suddenly became a name, the enormous progress he made from painting to painting was plain for all to see, and the light, which no reproduction in the world can recreate, given that it would miss its very essence, was ultimately rendered with an almost morbid abandon and beauty, which everyone who sees these pictures knows to be true to life, knows is demonstrable: this is exactly how it is. He hardly ever painted people, the rooms and landscapes are unpopulated, but not accidentally so, it is more as if the beholder is lost to them, hence dead. The way the dead see the world, that is how Van Gogh painted it. In order to get there, to the stark nothing of our lives in the midst of a world ablaze with color, he renounced everything. As he wanted only to paint, he renounced everything when he did that. And who, hand on heart, can say that he or she is willing to renounce everything? For everything does truly mean everything.

Well, I certainly couldn't, that's for sure.

Gombrowicz?

No, not everything. A lot, but not everything. He writes that the flight of art has to find its counterpart in the sphere of normal life, in the same way that the shadow of the condor spreads across the ground below. He writes that Gordian knots should not be solved with our intellect but with our lives. He writes that the truth is not just a question of argument but of attraction, that is, the power to attract. And he writes that an idea is and remains a screen behind which other, more important, things go on. There were no complicated truths. And they must have come at a price. The price was high, it was isolation, but the payoff, freedom of thought, was high too. In the ruthlessness of his thoughts he was akin to Nietzsche, and like Nietzsche's texts Gombrowicz's were descriptions of a path, not the path itself. If he had written about his sexual escapades with young men in the Buenos Aires harbor quarter, the joys and humiliations of these nocturnal adventures, the shame and the seduction, about waking up one Sunday in his filthy accommodation with the South American sun shining in through the window, about his many jobs, including one as a bank clerk, about his wounded pride, about his fantasies of nobility, in short, if he had described all the circumstances from which his thoughts – and through them his soul – rose, and in practice connected the highest (for even thoughts about the lowest rank among the highest in the diaries) with the lowest, that is, the fluff in his navel, the worm up his ass, the blood in his piss, the wax in his ears, or just an autumn day strolling in a park in Buenos Aires with a book by Bruno Schulz under his arm, he would have been the world's greatest writer, the modern-day Cervantes and Shakespeare, all rolled into one.

But he couldn't. He was free in thought but not in form, not quite.

Could I?

Fuck off, Karl Ove. You stupid little shit. I didn't even reach Gombrowicz's boot laces. The mere idea of saying something as honest and true about Norwegian literature anywhere near as honest as he did about Polish literature gave me a stomachache. Yes, my hands trembled at the very thought, that I could actually describe everything as it was. That all I had to do was just go ahead and do it.

What a treacherous thought!

"Just" my ass!

But Gombrowicz pointed, and said: that's how it is here, better go that way.

Perhaps I could do that?

If only I'd had a really profligate, sleazy past in the docklands of Buenos Aires, lived at the bottom like a crab, and gorged myself shamelessly on everything I came across, preferably killed someone with a rock to the head, as Rimbaud may have done, and, like him, fled to Africa and made a living as an arms smuggler, yes, anything but this, on a hotel balcony in the Canary Islands with two small children and a pregnant wife sleeping on the other side of the sliding-glass door, and all that this loaded the future with in terms of propriety and responsibility.

But there too Gombrowicz had given me a little hope, lit a barely perceptible flame in the great darkness of my banality. Didn't he write, "Physical comfort can sharpen the sensibilities of the soul, and behind the cozy curtains, in the suffocating sitting rooms of the middle classes, engenders a toughness of which those who attacked tanks with Molotov cocktails could never dream."

Oh, to hell with everything.

It would soon be four years since my last novel came out and I hadn't written anything of note in the meantime. Fuck all, in fact. For close to a year I've been fiddling around with an opening to a novel in which Henrik Vankel, the protagonist in my first novel and the intended writer of the second, wakes up in a hospital after a suicide attempt. I had left him in a bathtub in a house on an all-but-deserted island at the end of the previous novel, just after he had slashed his face and chest, and the idea was he would complete what he had started and cut an artery and slowly his blood would drain away, and his life too. I described how his eyesight was overrun, how there was something vegetative about the waning clarity, something growing and spreading inside him, it was death, and then the knocking at the door. Far, far in the distance, like outside a dream. Later it transpired it was the neighbor's son, one of the island's four other inhabitants, who had dropped by for a cup of coffee. A naval vessel lay anchored just off the coast, he contacted it, they took Henrik on board, and saved his life. I didn't believe in this story for a second, the part about the ship was particularly dubious and stupid, but there really had been a ship anchored up when I was living on the island, and it had made a great impression on me because it was somehow completely faceless, it just stood there in its world, with its cannons, not a single person to be seen on board. One day a little rubber dinghy was launched, it came into the bay in front of the house where I lived, four men in uniform pulled it ashore and ran inland. The dinghy lay there, beached, the whole day. In the evening it was gone. The next day the ship was gone too. All this was charged with meaning, so to speak, because both the ship and the crew of the dinghy stood out so incredibly clearly in an otherwise uneventful life on the island, they were out of the ordinary in every sense, although I didn't know what the meaning was. The events arrived sender unknown, out of nowhere, and the mysteriousness of the clarity fascinated me, it was like a poem. At the time a Russian submarine had sunk somewhere in the Barents Sea, the members of the crew were alive, but the boat couldn't be saved, and they died within a few days. While I stood brushing my teeth and surveying the mist-wreathed island with its yellow grass, dark brown rocks and crags, the surface of the water black and still, there were several hundred young Russians in a death trap somewhere out there at the bottom of the sea. At this very moment. When I joined my neighbor in his boat to go to the main island to buy some provisions, I saw the front pages of the newspapers as openings in the world. Kursk, Kursk. Every radio program started with an update on the situation. They were going to die in days, hours, minutes. I walked around the island, I sat reading, they were trapped in the deep. So all hope was gone, they must be lying there, every last one of them, at the bottom of the sea, like dead fish. Did they bang their fists against the walls in their last moments of life? Did they stagger around screaming with rage and despair? Did they lie there, motionless, waiting for the inevitable?

They died, and then they were forgotten, new accidents and disasters captured the world's attention. I too forgot all about it until I began to write about Henrik Vankel's last days on the island. Then I reflected that the events represented two diametrically opposed phenomena. One was the openness of our times, in which we are informed about everything, even about those dying at the bottom of a distant sea, while it is happening. The feeling this produced was one of constriction, a sense that we are never left in peace, we are always seen, there is no longer anywhere we can be alone. The way these incidents were dramatized created a familiarity with them. The second event, concerning the naval boat, wasn't dramatized at all, it was just something I saw, unprocessed, there was nothing familiar about it, it was an absolute mystery. From all this I concluded that writing had to move toward the unfamiliar, what we know but cannot describe. Actually that was true for everything because even if everything were explained and understood, it would always exist as a phenomenon as well, something in itself, closed off and apart.

The world had to be closed again.

But I was getting nowhere. I began to write about what happened in the grandmother's house when Henrik Vankel's father died and he was there with his brother, Klaus, but I didn't have an ounce of faith in it, everything was artificial and for show. I spent three weeks describing how Henrik took his luggage off the carousel at the Kristiansand airport, when Klaus went to pick him up, then I rejected it.

That was how far I'd got. For this reason, reading Gombrowicz was humiliating, the standard was so high, and to make things worse I agreed with just about everything he wrote.

I picked up the book and resumed reading. I had got to the last part, where Gombrowicz has left Argentina and moved to France. All the power, all the tension, and all the radicalism had disappeared from his prose, suddenly his style is drained of life and any remaining sharpness seems a little tired, mechanical, and repetitious.

What happened? Had he got old or was it the loss of exotic surroundings that did it? Europe is an old continent and that is where he came from, where he grew up, it was in him. In those days he was on familiar ground, he was strong, he was young. Could it be that this vitality, which otherwise would have died along with his curiosity, in his forties to judge from others, could it have been prolonged by his foreign adventures? Or was it just that he was dying in a dying culture, a bit like the composer in Thomas Mann's Death in Venice?

I read for an hour. Then I went indoors and got into bed, in my running gear, I couldn't be bothered to change. The next morning I put on a film for Vanja and Heidi, The Little Ghost Godfrey, showered, had a smoke on the balcony, and went down with the others to the hotel entrance, where a minibus pulled up ten minutes later. We showed the tickets we had been given, placed the folded stroller and the bag of swimming things in the back, and got in. There were two other couples with us. Soon we were whizzing along the same cliff road Vanja and I had been down the day before. No one said anything, I gazed across the sea, squinting. Heidi started to cry, her face was ashen, was she carsick? She lay with her head on Linda's lap, Linda stroked her hair until she fell asleep while, luckily, Vanja was unaffected by any potential jealousy and stared across the sea, which lay like a floor beneath the roof of the sky.

Less than an hour later the minibus drove up a paved road to a resplendent luxury hotel on a hill, alongside verges of flowers, rows of palm trees, and lustrous green lawns. The driver stopped the vehicle, opened the door, and we – the motley package-tour family from Malmö – got out into the already oppressive heat. A woman with a name badge on her chest stood at the entrance looking at us. I unfolded the stroller, ashamed of all the stains on the canvas, looked over at her, and smiled politely. We're just going to the beach, I said. But we were supposed to take a look at the hotel first, I understand?

"Come this way, please," she said.

Vanja and Heidi stood looking around, slightly wary in these strange surroundings. Linda had her eyes fixed on me. She smiled when I met them.

We walked through the swinging door and into the reception area. The dark tiles on the floor shone in the light flooding through the enormous panoramic windows, the air was cool, the people working behind the counter wore suits or uniforms. Elevators went up and down all the time, not inside invisible shafts, but on the outside of the walls in glass tubes. Inside, there was a kind of shopping arcade with small, exclusive boutiques on both sides. It resembled an ocean liner, I thought, one of the gigantic luxury liners where no expense is spared and everything is available on board.

The woman with the name badge showed us into an area to the left of the reception desk with sofas and chairs, where a few lost tourists in holiday garb were sitting, and a counter where we were given a form to fill in. Name, address, telephone number.

What on earth was all this about?

We filled in the information, gave back the form, they said we could sit down and wait, we would be called when the time came.

Called?

Vanja and Heidi climbed up onto the stone ledge running along the inside of the window, crawled along on all fours, stood up suddenly like monkeys, and pressed their hands against the glass. Don't do that, I said, you'll leave marks. They ignored me, shouted to each other, crawled farther along. I checked to see if they had caught anyone's attention, they hadn't, and I sat down beside Linda, who was leaning back with her hands over her protruding belly. A TV screen hung from a column not far away, showing pictures of what I presumed to be the hotel where we were, probably the lower floor because there was a beach, the people there were suntanned and slim and seemed to be having a good time. Behind them was a building with terraces all the way up, filmed from a distance. A palace, a golden beach, and in the sea beyond a water-sports paradise.

Heidi knelt in front of a large flowerpot picking up the Leca pebbles from inside. I walked over to her, moved her away, and put the pebbles back while Vanja pressed her lips against the window, and I walked over to her and lifted her down. Can't you two come and sit with us for a bit, I said, but they couldn't, they wanted to go to the other end of the concourse where the avenue of shops started, there was an aquarium, and I went there with them, picked them up in turn so that they could see the fish close up, while glancing behind me from time to time to see what was happening. The people who passed us looked affluent, and I wondered what it was that made me think that, because it was the morning, they were on holiday and walked around wearing everyday shorts or skirts. Could it be something about their self-confident posture? Whatever it was I felt inferior and, with the children's arms and legs all over the place, lacking in authority and dignity.

That's Dad, Heidi said, indicating an unmoving yellowy-brown fish with an enormous lump above its head. And that's Mom, Vanja said, pointing to an elegant orange fish with a long veil tail. And that's me! Heidi cried. She directed a little finger at a tiny blue and yellow fish, beautiful as a jewel. That's me! Vanja said, and pointed to a red and white clownfish. Nemo! I'm Nemo!

"OK," I said. "Now we should go back. Come on, you little clowns."

They ran after me, taking their own illogical routes across the floor, and pulled up right behind the sofa where Linda sat, very abruptly in fact, for there, only a few meters away, stood a teddy-bear-like creature – as tall as a man with an enormous head – which, when it caught sight of us, started to walk our way. Ill at ease and probably afraid, but also fascinated and excited, they stared at it with innocent blue eyes and mouths agape. He stopped in front of them and stretched out a hand, but neither Heidi nor Vanja realized that they were supposed to hold it. He held a paw in the air as though he had suddenly remembered something, turned, and shuffled over to a table, then came back with two disposable cameras, which he handed to them.

"Mommy, Mommy, what's this?" Vanja said after he had gone.

"A camera, I think," she said.

"Can I see?" I said.

Vanja passed hers to me. It was a disposable underwater camera.

"You can take pictures underwater with this," I said.

"Can we?" Vanja said. "I want to do it! When are we going swimming?"

"Soon," I said.

"Why did we get it?" Vanja asked.

"I don't know," I answered. She raised the camera to her eye. Behind her a middle-aged man wearing jeans and a blazer came toward us. He was semi-bald with dark hair at the sides and holding a thin folder in one hand.

"Linda and Karl Ove?" he said.

We nodded, he stopped and shook our hands, told us in faintly accented Swedish to follow him and he would show us around. We walked down the arcade, he paused in front of a wall full of pictures, all of celebrities. Norwegian, Swedish, and the occasional American.

"They've all stayed here," he said.

"You don't say," I said.

He stretched out a hand, and we went down a long corridor. Tiles, mirrors, gilt balustrade.

"What do you do back in Sweden?" he asked.

"Karl Ove's a writer," Linda said.

"Linda is too," I said.

"How interesting," he said. "Might I have heard of you?"

"Karl Ove's quite well known," Linda said with a smile.

Why did she say that? Jesus Christ, how foolish.

"Ah!" he said. "Then we'll have to take a picture of you afterward and hang it on our celebrity wall."

"I'm not sure about that," I said.

He laughed out loud.

"I was only joking, sir," he said.

Red-faced with embarrassment, I looked down at the floor in front of me.

"I realized of course," I said.

"But perhaps you will be famous one day, you know. Then we'll hang up a picture of you. I promise you. If you become guests of ours here, that is!"

"Mm," I said.

He came to a halt by an elevator and pressed the button, which glowed dimly. Heidi stared at the light. Pressed the button. At that moment the door opened and an expression of shock spread across her face.

The elevator was almost completely covered with mirrors. I inadvertently glanced at myself for a brief instant. I looked like an idiot. The white T-shirt, bought for 49 kronor at Åhléns two years before, loose at the neck and a bit too tight around my waist where the fat bulged out, and the military-green three-quarter-length trousers with all the pockets and dangling laces, also bought at Åhléns, for 149 kronor, which in my imagination I had seen as pretty cool gear, and the worn-out Adidas, once white now gray, which I wore without socks, became in these luxurious surroundings a sort of curse, it was impossible not to feel deferential, undignified even, as the elevator sank to ground level.

"Where on the island are you staying then?" he asked.

Linda gave him the name of the hotel complex. He nodded.

"How much did you pay in all? For everything?"

"Twenty-five thousand," I said. "Then costs for food and so on top of that."

"That's not cheap," he said as the elevator came to rest and the doors slid open. The heat hit us as we exited. We were at the foot of the hotel, right next to the beach.

"Let's go this way," he said. "To that island. It was made when the hotel was built."

"Really?" I said.

"Yes," he said. "No expense spared here. Our prices are still low though. It's based on an entirely new holiday concept. It's a standard hotel in one way – you can rent a room – but it's also possible to buy a room or a suite if you want. Forever. You pay a one-time sum and then you can stay here every summer for the rest of your life.

"Oh?" I said.

"Yes," he said. "It's brilliant. It costs a lot less than an apartment would cost here. And at the same time you get so much more for your money. We're talking real luxury here."

Heidi had had enough. She stretched her arms up to Linda.

"I can't carry you, you know, my love," she said.

"Baby in your tummy!" Heidi said.

"That's right," Linda said.

"How old are your girls?" he asked. "How sweet they are!"

Vanja turned her head away, I lifted Heidi up and started to walk across the terrace, past an Italian café and ice-cream parlor, where two elderly ladies with wrinkled suntanned skin were sitting in bikinis drinking coffee, both wearing sunglasses and sun hats.

"Vanja's three and a half," I said. "Heidi's one and a half."

"And when are you expecting the next one? You are, aren't you?"

"Yes, we are," I said, with a glance at Linda. "In the middle of August, right?"

She nodded, walking a few paces behind us, holding Vanja's hand.

"And you live in Sweden?"

"We live in Malmö," Linda said.

"It's a nice town," I said. "Big enough and a little offbeat. But what about you? How come you speak Swedish?"

"I worked in Sweden for many years," he said. "In Stockholm."

"Oh!" I said. "We did too. Where did you live?"

"In Nacka," he said.

"In Nacka!" I said. "We've been there a lot. Some friends of ours live there."

"It's a small world," he said with a smile. "It's very nice there. I love Sweden."

"Mm," I said, putting Heidi down. "Now you can walk yourself. We want to go over there. Vanja, can you hold Heidi's hand?"

When we were on the island, which was like a park with trees and fountains, he wanted to know if we'd heard about the hotel. We hadn't. What about the concept then? It was in fact Norwegian, he said, and mentioned the name of the entrepreneur. I shook my head, then, to my surprise, Linda said she had heard of it. I looked at her. Had she really? He wanted to know where she'd heard about it, whether some friends had told her, she said she had seen a TV program. Was she making that up? If so, why?

He started to talk about the hotel, how elegant and luxurious it was, how the sand on the beach had been transported all the way from the Bahamas, the restaurants and shops were top class, all the rooms were magnificent, even those in the lowest price range, and there were always lots of Norwegians and Swedes here. All the time he was talking, beneath the dark blue morning sky, the sun beating down with such intensity that my shoulders, cheeks, and the bridge of my nose were burning, and the light seemed to neutralize all the nuances of the countryside around us, all this time I was keeping an eye on Vanja and Heidi, who wandered ahead of us and behind us. And the longer he was with us the more unkempt and dirtier I felt. He was silver-tongued and pleasant, had a kind of management air about him, and could well have been if not the hotel manager then perhaps his deputy. It was beginning to pain me that he was spending so much time on us. The idea was of course that we would talk about the hotel to our friends. But it was inconceivable that any of our friends would stay at this hotel, certainly not mine anyway, so we were wasting his time. I didn't know how to express this to him. At the same time it was as if he trusted us, as if he realized the way we dressed didn't convey the whole truth about our personal qualities, and I tried to reinforce this by being as friendly and jovial as I could. And, I told myself, I really would mention this hotel to people when we got home. We owed it to him, I thought, as we strolled along side by side. The sun didn't seem to have any effect on him; apart from a shimmering film of moisture on his forehead and above his top lip, the heat left him untouched.

At the far end of the island he stopped and turned. From here you have a wonderful view, he said. The best apartments are at the top, all with large balconies, as you can see. The less expensive ones are farther down, but they are all spacious and of a high standard.

"Yes, it really looks wonderful," I said. "Absolutely fantastic."

Linda looked at me.

"What do you think?" I said.

"Yes, it's very nice."

There was a negative tone to her voice and I felt a twinge of irritation. But he probably didn't notice anything. Only those closest to her could interpret the tiny variations of mood and temper that constantly emanated from her. No, not even them. Only I could.

"Perhaps we should go back," the man said. "Then you can see one of the apartments from the inside."

"I'm not sure that's necessary," Linda said. "We've formed a picture of what they're like now."

He looked at me, and I smiled apologetically.

"It wouldn't do any harm, would it?" I said. "We can have a little peep, can't we? Don't you think?"

She nodded, reluctantly it had to be said, but she assented, and I called the children, who of course didn't want to go. Vanja was beating the surface of the water in the fountain with a little stick she had found, Heidi was lying on her stomach with her hands deeply immersed in the water.

"Hey, girls, we're going now. We just have to see one room. There's an ice cream for you afterwards."

"Don't want one," Heidi said. I grabbed her around the waist and lifted her up.

"No!" Vanja said, and ran away. Heidi kicked and struggled. I laid her over my shoulder and ran after Vanja. Fortunately Heidi was laughing, that wonderful bubbly laughter she had come out with ever since the first few months of her life. I put her down, took a few quick steps, and caught up with Vanja, who had become jealous of her sister.

"I want Mommy," she said.

She always wanted Mommy, regardless of what I did. Sometimes I thought it was because I was so hard on her and unreasonable; sometimes I thought that was just the way it was.

"She's over there!" I said now. "All you have to do is walk!"

She squinted into the sun, and her mouth opened as though connected with her eyes in a secret, to her unknown, pact. I knew the mannerism from Linda. When I had been most in love and my insides burned like a forest fire it had been as though the slight movements of her lips passed straight into my soul. I had never been as open as I was then. The whole world streamed through me.

Vanja turned and ran over to Linda, grabbed her hand and snuggled up to her. Heidi had sat down on the ground; I lifted her up and followed the others.

In a corridor at the top of the hotel the man asked us to wait, he just had to check if the room was empty and had been cleaned.

"I want to go to the beach," Vanja said.

"Soon," I said. "We just want to have a look at this room."

"Why?" Vanja asked.

"Good question," Linda said, and smiled at her.

At that moment the man reappeared and waved us into a room. Open windows, curtains fluttering in the Atlantic breeze, light colors, shiny stone floor, the feeling of trespassing as Heidi and Vanja walked around, no sandals on the sofa, do you hear me, don't pull at it, no, be careful now, you might break it! He took us onto the large balcony, the sea blue and heavy and glittering in the sun, the sky vast and deep, the cliffs along the coast to the south in shade. The cars on the road there tiny, like busy insects. He said all this could be ours if we wanted, and without it costing us that much. I asked how much. He repeated that you pay a one-time sum and you could be here for a few weeks every year. It was like buying a stake in an apartment or in a mountain cabin, he said with a smile to me. No maintenance, no cleaning, everything taken care of, so we could have a luxury holiday every year for the rest of our lives. As parents of small children we deserved that, he said. Live in a paradise like this every single summer. And if you prefer to buy a stake in one of the smaller apartments you retain all the rights and the full service, of course.

He asked us to follow him. Making us such an offer meant that he actually believed we could afford something like this. That was why he was spending so much of his time on us. So at least he hadn't thought we were a traveling flea circus, as Linda was wont to call us. In the corridor he told us how much the cheapest apartment cost, and the most expensive. The price wasn't out of the question, at least not for the bottom of the range.

We were ushered into a huge carpeted conference room full of men in shirts and ties and women wearing blouses sitting in front of computers, many of them engaged in conversation with clients like us. There were several TV screens showing pictures of the hotel and the countryside around, there was a lounge with brochures displayed on a low table, the air was cool, almost cold, the atmosphere one of professionalism and efficiency. He guided us to a high table where there was a thick folder he asked us to peruse. It turned out that if you bought a stake you didn't have to come here every year because there were other equally luxurious hotels all over the world where we, if we paid the one-time fee, could stay free of charge. We wouldn't have that option if we bought the standard holiday home or mountain cabin. Now he would leave us alone, there was something important he had to do, but he would be back.

I thumbed through the folder, Linda took care of the children. My eyes lingered on a hotel in the Alps. The photo had been taken in the autumn, before the snow had fallen, and the sight of the countryside, the steep rock faces with the green conifers and the melancholic glowing foliage at the bottom, the fences and country roads, and the old, white-walled hotel awakened a great yearning in me. Oh, to be there. I turned the pages, there were hotels in Mexico, Italy, France. We could travel around the world every summer or autumn, the whole family, it would be a magnificent experience, at least for the children. Perhaps my mother could stand security so we could get a loan? Or I could get a bigger advance from the publisher?

I called Linda and showed her the photo of the hotel in the Alps. I suppose she must have seen how excited I was because she said it was lovely, but that we couldn't afford it. Don't say that, I said. We can probably wangle it somehow. It is actually a good opportunity. Not the hotel here necessarily, but all the others. And it's not a lot of money. Not really.

"We don't have any money," Linda said. "And I have a problem with the feel of this place. I've had enough of the upper crust in my life."

We sat down. It felt as though we were in a large prestigious law firm or at the European headquarters of a multinational company. The man who had shown us around appeared at the other end of the room a few minutes later and beckoned us over. Our relationship changed when we sat down on one side of the desk and he, with all his piles of papers and folders in front of him, on the other. We were his clients. He asked us what we thought of all we had seen, was this for us? So he assumed that we were affluent enough to enter into a deal. It felt good that he could see past our clothes and style. He was taking us very seriously. I said we were definitely interested. Perhaps not in this particular hotel, but all the others and the fact that you could move around. You could, couldn't you? I had to know for sure, I said. Yes, that was correct, he said. So would we be able to manage the financial side? I wasn't sure. It depended. Would you like us to look at it together? he asked. Yes, we can do that, I said as the children began to move around in territory that grew bigger the more secure they felt. What is your income? he asked. I told him how much I earned, the scholarship plus my monthly consultancy fee, and added that in the good periods, when I came out with a new book, it was much higher. Then I could earn several hundred thousand in one go. One way of doing this was to take out a loan now and then pay it off as the money came in. That is one option, yes, he said. How much are your monthly expenses? I told him, and he wrote it down and looked up at me. Do you have any savings? If not, it will be hard for you to get a loan on this. No, we don't have anything else, I said. But it would be possible to get someone to stand surety for us, I think. Do you think you could arrange that now? You can call from here free of charge.

I looked at Linda.

"That would be a bit stressful," I said. "Can't we do this when we get back home? Just take some papers with us and then read them at our leisure?"

He shook his head and smiled.

"What I'm giving you now is a special offer. You're entitled to it because you're here. It requires you to make up your minds rather quickly. There's a lot of interest, you know. We can't reserve it just for you."

"But we can't tie this up here and now," I said.

"Do you think you have the means to go through with this? If you know you have, you can sign now and juggle the finances when you get home. But you have to be absolutely sure."

"We can't afford it," Linda said. "Nowhere near."

He gave a sigh of resignation and leaned back.

I looked at her.

"We can try," I said. "We can do it if we want."

"But do we want to? I couldn't imagine coming here every summer for the rest of my life. It sounds like a nightmare to be honest."

The impoliteness of what she said cut me like a knife.

"I think it's really nice here," I said. "But the hotel here isn't the point. It's all the others we gain access to. Actually, I think it's a very good idea."

"But we can't make up our minds now. We have to think it over!"

I looked at him.

"Can we think about it? And then contact you from home?"

"As I said, the offer is only valid for today. But who was it you thought could stand surety for a loan?"

"My mother possibly," I said.

He pushed the phone over to me.

"You can give her a call now," he said. "Then we can clear this up right away."

"We need more time," I said. "We have so little money that such an outlay has enormous consequences for us. We'll have to think about it."

I spoke in an almost pleading voice so that he would understand I wished things were not as they were. But it didn't help. When I said that, he seemed to change personality. All his amiability was gone, his kindly eyes went black, he rose to his feet, his movements stiff with irritation.

"If you don't have any money, what are you doing here?" he said.

"I'm sorry," I said.

"If you go out and turn right you'll come to a terraza. Take a seat and a colleague will come and take care of you."

He turned and walked over to one of his colleagues. I felt like running after him and apologizing again. Or telling him we were joking, of course we had the money, give me the contract and we'll sign. Instead I stood up, lifted Heidi, and we made our way to the exit with the defeat stinging and aching inside me.

"Let's just get out of here, no?" Linda said. "We don't need any more of this."

"We promised we would wait for his colleague," I said. "Out there, didn't he say?"

I nodded toward a terraza behind a glass partition. We went out, sat down at one of the tables. No one came, Heidi was tired, it was her bedtime and she whined while Vanja nagged us for an ice cream and to go to the beach.

"Let's go," Linda said. "Come on."

"No," I said. "We promised we'd wait. So we wait."

The man who was to take care of us was young, wore black Prada sunglasses, a white shirt, and a tie. He had the same folder as his older colleague, placed it on the table in front of him and said in English he had an offer for us. We could have a two-week stay at the hotel at a much reduced price, almost half price in fact, he said.

"We came here for the beach," Linda said. "We were promised tickets for beach chairs today. We've already been here for two hours."

He looked at me.

"We don't have the money, I'm afraid," I said.

It was true, I had five thousand kronor left in my account, at most. It had to last us for the next four days.

He got up. His movements too showed signs of irritation.

"Then I'll get you your precious tickets," he said, and was gone.

"I'm utterly exhausted," Linda said. "And hungry."

"I understand," I said. "But we can eat at one of the cafés down there and then you can relax on the beach afterwards. Heidi's fallen asleep. And I can take care of Vanja."

The salesman didn't return for half an hour. Mute, a scornful grimace on his young face, he placed the tickets on the table and left. We had something to eat, Heidi slept in the stroller, I went for a swim with Vanja, who used up the whole roll of film in thirty minutes. Even though the sand was fine-grained and golden, and the water in the lagoon an exotic green, it felt as if we were there on sufferance and could be thrown out at any point. We hadn't shown ourselves to be worthy enough. But we couldn't go home, not until the taxi came for us and the other Swedish couple, who were now lying a few beach chairs away and, unlike us, seemed to be enjoying life.

"I would never have believed I'd be glad to get back here," I said as, some hours later, the minibus turned off the main road and drove down to the hotel. "But I am."

"Me too," Linda said. "Imagine you actually considering buying a time-share!"

"Yes, it's unbelievable. But the worst is that I didn't catch on. I didn't get what was happening until afterwards! But you did, right?"

"Yes. I wondered what you were up to."

"I was taken in hook, line, and sinker. Oh, the thought of it is so painful! Accepting the tickets in the first place without realizing what was going on. An hour in a taxi. Who would pay for that without any hope of gain?"

Linda laughed.

"Yes, go on, laugh," I said. "We won't breathe a word of this to anyone, OK?"

"OK!"

In the evening, after we had been to see Coco the clown on the stage by the pools, and the children had gone to bed, we sat on the balcony and talked at length for the first time in ages, me with my feet on the railing and a bottle of beer in my hand, Linda with her hands folded over her voluminous belly. We decided never to go on such a vacation again, it was pointless, neither one of us enjoyed it, everything was done for the children, based on some notion of the family and the ideal of a normal, healthy father and mother and two children by the pool, on a beach, in a Spanish restaurant, suntanned and happy, all of which, however, paled the closer we came to the reality of it, and in the end, once we were actually there, went up in smoke. We should have rented a house, I said, somewhere we liked, it wouldn't have been any more expensive. I agree, Linda answered. I don't like this any more than you do. But the worst, I said, is that I find myself on two levels the whole time. One level is the children's because they are having a really good time, they can't see through all this, for them Coco is a genuine clown, a fairy-tale figure. They have no idea that the waiters despise us or that they show Norwegian TV and sell Dagbladet in the kiosk, for them this is a fantastic place, and I have to keep thinking that too, if you see what I mean. This is a world for children, not for adults. And then I think that almost our whole culture is too. That it's actually for children.

I looked at her.

"But that doesn't bother you?"

"Yes, it does. Of course it does. Was I inattentive?"

"A bit. But it doesn't matter. You have other things on your mind. I understand that."

"Not at all," she said.

"What were you thinking about?"

"Heidi. It feels almost unfair for her to have another sibling when she's so small."

"It's only good for her."

"Maybe."

"It is as it is anyway," I said, on my feet to get another beer from the fridge. The effect of the two I had already drunk lay like a veil of well-being over my consciousness, and another one, I knew, would charge it with a faint sense of anticipation, which a couple more would dispel, whereafter everything would be good. A couple more and I would convert my mood into actions, anesthetized against any objections and common sense, and then, if I went out, everything inside would be glittering and sparkling.

Oh, how I loved drinking.

I loved it.

The longing to do so came only when I had drunk a little, then I seemed to remember what it was like and realized what I really wanted, which was to drink copious quantities, drink myself senseless, unconscious, as deep down in the shit as I could go. I wanted to drink myself out of house and home, drink myself out of family and friends, drink myself out of everything I loved and held dear. Drink, drink, drink. Oh my God, just drinking and drinking, night and day, summer and autumn, winter and spring.

I opened the fridge door, held the cold, slim beer bottle, whipped off the cap, and took a couple of long swigs before going back to the balcony.

"Do you remember when we saw each other for the first time?" I said, sitting down. "What would you have thought if you'd known you were going to marry and have three children with him? That foolish Norwegian?"

"My heart would have melted," she said with a smile.

"Come off it," I said.

"But you're right about you being 'that Norwegian.' Ingmar had talked a lot about you beforehand. Almost all of it was about you and your book, so I was well aware you were coming."

"But you didn't want me," I said.

"Of course I did. Just not at that moment. I was heading somewhere else. If it had happened then, we wouldn't be sitting here now."

"No," I said. "I remember going into the common room, the one with the big fireplace, everyone was there, and I just had to leave. I couldn't take being in the same room as you or rather I couldn't stand seeing you talking to others and having a life beyond me."

"I didn't even know you!"

"No. But that didn't matter. So I left and sat on the steps outside the hut where my room was, and prayed to God that you would follow me out. I never pray to God – I haven't since I was a child – but I did then. Make Linda come to me, I said. Dear God, can you do that? And then the door opened! And you came out! Do you remember?"

She shook her head.

"I thought I was dreaming. You came out, you closed the door behind you, you started to cross the yard, over to where I was sitting. At that moment I believed in God. I thought he had intervened. But then you didn't turn in my direction, you just kept going, to where you were staying. You said hi. Do you remember?"

"No."

"You were just going to get something."

"Oh, Karl Ove," she said. "Now I'm starting to feel bad!"

"I'm not surprised."

"If I'd gone over to you, we wouldn't be sitting here now."

"Are you sure?"

"Yes."

"Because you fell ill? Because you went to the hospital?"

"Yes."

"Maybe I would've been there with you. Have you considered that?"

"Maybe. But I didn't want that. I was a very different person then."

"You were. When I met you next, in Stockholm, that was my first thought. Your whole personality was different."

"In what way?"

"There was none of the hardness in you. The performance side of you was gone. Mm, how should I explain it? You'd been tough, cool, self-confident. Yes, you'd had your own very distinctive personality. That was the feeling I had. And when I met you again that was gone."

"My own what?"

"Your own distinctive personality. You were enough as you were."

"You didn't recognize me?"

"No, but I'm not talking about who you actually were. I'm talking about how you appeared to me. I was utterly defenseless against that. As you know."

"Yes, but that wasn't what you got. I'm sitting here now with an enormous belly. And those two children in there. It doesn't feel as if I have anything of my own."

"I know. It's better though. It's so, so much better."

She fell silent.

I drank up the beer and fetched myself another.

"A penny for your thoughts," I said. We had switched off the light outside, so she was sitting in near darkness, the glow from the window like a faint stripe across one side of her face.

"I'm thinking about everything I've lost," she said.

"Better to think about everything you've gained," I said.

"There's so much contempt in you," she said. "I know you look down on me."

"Look down on you? I certainly do not!" I said.

"Yes, you do. You think I do too little. I whine all the time. I'm not independent enough. You're sick of this life of ours. And of me. You never tell me I'm beautiful anymore. Actually I don't mean anything to you. I'm just someone you live with who happens to be the mother of your children."

"No, that's not true," I said. "But you're right that sometimes I think you don't do enough."

"My friends can't understand how I manage to achieve all I do. Two children and pregnant with a third. I don't think you have any idea how much that really is."

"Your friends don't know anything. You shouldn't listen to them. They're just trying to comfort you. It's like the time Jörgen came home, you know, you told me about it, when you and Helena were sitting on the sofa drinking tea. 'Sitting here whining again, are you,' he said. Do you remember that?"

There was a hint of a smile, but her eyes were cold.

We said nothing for a long time. The faint sound of the sea lapping against the shore hung like a veil over the artificial landscape below us. Muted voices from the balconies beneath and the odd shout or gale of laughter from the restaurants farther down.

I lit a cigarette, took a swig of beer, and grabbed a handful of peanuts from the bowl on the table between us.

This was what she usually said when we had a fight and she tried with her frenzied attacks to rip the heart out of my chest. That I looked down on her and I should leave her and find myself another woman, someone who was nice and independent enough to leave me in peace. That I was staying with her out of pure duty and it wasn't enough for her. She knew what she was worth and she was worth much more than this.

But this had not been a fight. She hadn't tried to rip the heart from my chest. She had said what she said calmly and firmly, as if it were a fact of life. And I had only objected as a matter of form.

I knew she would soon get up and go to bed. I felt a kind of panic grip me, the air had to be cleared, Linda placated, the situation could not remain unresolved.

She placed a hand on the railing.

"I'm sorry," I said.

"What about?"

"Everything."

"You shouldn't be," she said. "Right now I'm actually enough as I am. But of course this changes. Sometimes being pregnant makes me feel strong and I think I can manage everything alone if need be."

"That's the first time I've heard you say that," I said.

"And then it completely goes and I feel I'm utterly dependent on you. Then I get so frightened. Do you understand? I feel I have nothing myself. If you go, everything goes. It's a terrible feeling. And I see that is precisely what you like least of all. And if you did go, that would be the reason. But I can't do anything about it."

"I know."

"And you're longing to get away."

"I am not. I want to be here. Hand on heart."

She didn't say anything.

"I read something in Gombrowicz yesterday that I've been thinking about," I said. "It's about why we don't allow ourselves to be surprised by anything, how we can walk round a corner without being curious to know what is waiting for us there. How we can sit in a restaurant and not be curious about the soup we've ordered, how it will taste. That's what my problem is. Do you understand? I take everything for granted. And it's a poison. I don't look down on you, I think you're wonderful, but when I take everything for granted and there's no reaction it gets on my nerves. That's what I mean. It gets on my nerves."

"Do I get on your nerves?"

"Come on, you know. When I'm grouchy and pissed off, of course that's what happens."

She got up and went inside. I followed.

"Surely you understand what I mean!" I said. "I'm not making some great statement. I'm just trying to explain something."

She undressed without looking at me and got into bed. I sat on the edge beside her.

"What do I do that gets on your nerves?" she said after a while.

"It's not something you do," I said.

"You have to tell me and I'll stop doing it," she said.

"But it's nothing specific, don't you understand?"

"Is it all our life together?"

"Oh, come on! You know what it's like to feel out of sorts. There's something inside you. Right? That's what I was trying to describe. It's something inside me."

I stroked her back. She lay perfectly still, looking into the distance.

"What shall we do tomorrow?" she said.

"I don't know," I said. "But I'm not that keen to spend the whole day here."

When she lay on her side like that you could see her stomach wasn't just a stomach, there was something inside, an object, and the biological reality, she, this human female, was duplicating herself piercing the veil of notions that her personality, the woman she was for me, all we had experienced and thought together – cast over everything. As though we lived one life in our language and ideas and another in our bodies.

"No," she said. "Couldn't we go on the trip to Las Palmas we'd talked about?"

I nodded and got to my feet.

"Yes, let's do that. Sleep tight."

"Don't stay up too long."

"No."

"Sleep tight."

I walked through the apartment, switched on the balcony light, sat down, and gazed into the distance. I wasn't thinking about anything special, but I was filled with the emotions aroused by what Linda had said and the way she'd behaved. After a while, maybe twenty minutes or so, I took out

Gombrowicz's diaries again and looked for the passage I had mentioned to Linda.

> For some time now (perhaps because my life is so monotonous) I've occasionally been seized by curiosity with an intensity I've never experienced before – a curiosity as to what might happen the next moment. Right in front of my nose – a wall of darkness out of which at any moment a menacing apparition might reveal itself. Around the corner . . . what is lurking there? A person? A dog? If it is a dog, what size, what breed? I am sitting at a table and in a minute the soup will be served . . . but what kind of soup? Art hasn't yet addressed this basic experience in any comprehensive way, man as an instrument to transform the Unknown into the Known does not figure among art's greatest heroes.

He wrote that one Wednesday in 1953. I associated it with something I had once read by Deleuze while I was a student in Bergen and it had become a sort of landmark for me, which I came back to again and again: the idea that the world is permanently in the making, that it is constantly evolving around us, but that this ceaseless creation from moment to moment merges into what we already know about the world. Of the two forms of understanding we have developed – science and art – science pertains to certainty and calculation whereas art, by emerging from nothing, pertains to the moment and the uncertainty that lies in its constant creation. No artist had worked more with this than Cézanne, it was his principle and vocation, and the reason for his immense influence on his contemporaries. With a predetermined concept of what space is you can paint various objects without the space being changed, the system is invariable and unshakable, this is how we see, and hence this is how space is. In Cézanne's paintings the opposite is the case, here it is the objects that make the space, space is something that is made, and its making is relative. Then it is as much about the eye that beholds as what the eye beholds; the convention of space, which is usually invisible, becomes visible.

For fifteen years I had been doing this, seeking out thinkers who confirmed this idea, especially Nietzsche and Heidegger, but also Foucault, who was more preoccupied with social rather than existential structure and thereby deepened the discussion. The problem was that I hadn't moved any further, hadn't budged from the spot in the fifteen years that had passed since I studied literature and the history of art in Bergen. Basically it flew in the face of everything. Inception, creation, emergence, the eternally new – just not in me or in my understanding.

I got up and went to the bathroom for a piss. My urine was light-colored, almost completely clear, and I was reminded of my father's, which I had seen whenever he had forgotten, for some reason or other, to flush in the morning. It had been dark yellow, almost brown. It was frightening. I had connected the color with his mind. And with masculinity. My own pale, almost colorless, urine was feminine, his dark urine masculine. His temper was also masculine. My terror was feminine.

I flushed the toilet and returned to the balcony, stood for a while and gazed across the lawn.

No, I didn't look down on her, she was wrong there. But she demanded so much of me, so unutterably more than any other person ever had, and she didn't realize. Sometimes it was so exasperating that it threw me into a state akin to insanity. I became so angry that nothing else existed apart from anger, without my being able to give vent to it, I held it inside me, and the way I was then, when my fury engulfed me and was absorbed into my body, when my movements rumbled with rage, could of course be confused with contempt. No, it was contempt. For a while it was, but the moment would pass and then something else was waiting. Was this something else the true state of affairs? Did we actually get along? Did I really love her? Christ, no, everything shifted and changed and ebbed and flowed, one thing was no truer than anything else. We got along fine and we got along badly, I loved her and I didn't love her.

The night before our wedding I asked her to wash the kitchen floor. I had already washed every single one of the other one hundred and thirty square meters. On her knees with a rag in her hand, she looked up at me and said this was not how it was supposed to be, that she had to wash the kitchen floor the day before her own wedding. No one else would put up with it, she said.

It was unfair, she said. I answered that it was our floor and we were the ones who had to wash it, wedding or no wedding. I said nothing about this being only the second time she had washed a floor in the five years we had been together. If I had she would have lost her temper, would have said she had done all sorts of other things, she was the one who held the family together and she did more than anyone else she knew. I would have replied that she was living a lie, and then it would have gone on and on, so I said nothing. The following day I said Yes to her and she said Yes to me and we gazed at each other with tears in our eyes.

It is through feelings we connect with one another and it is the feelings which are good and bad, not the days.

I seemed to sense something behind me and turned at once, but the room was empty.

May as well go to bed, I thought.

Sink into a world that was beyond the world, the wonderful void.

I woke up in a bad mood. I always did, but as long as I had the critical first half an hour in peace, got a cup of coffee down me, and smoked a cigarette, it passed of its own accord. It was half past five. I pulled on the T-shirt and trousers I had worn the day before, walked barefoot into the living room, where Vanja and Heidi were sitting with bowls of muesli in front of them, Heidi on a high chair, Vanja on a normal one, which made her so low her chin barely reached over the table. Linda stood at the counter slicing an apple. Without saying a word I poured water into the kettle, sprinkled instant coffee into a cup, poured milk and muesli into a bowl, took it with me to the balcony, closed the door and sat down to eat, with my back to them. The sky was gray, more fog than mist, the air cold. After I had gulped down the breakfast mixture I went back in, filled my cup with boiling water, got my cigarettes and lighter from the shelf in the hall, and went back out. My body was cold, my joints were cold, my soul was cold. Behind me someone banged on the window, I turned, it was Vanja, and she pushed the glass door open.

"Go back in," I said. "I'll be along soon."

She squeezed through, stood by the railing, and looked across the empty lawn.

"Go back in, I said."

"No," she said with a pout. "Why is no one out?"

"Because you get up so early. No one else gets up at this hour. It's still nighttime."

"It's morning," she said.

"OK, OK," I said. "But it's very early morning. You'll realize how early it is when you're an adult. Where are your glasses by the way?"

"Inside."

"Go and put them on. Then you can both watch a movie."

She did as I said, and soon they were on their chairs in front of the laptop. Where movies were concerned they were insatiable, they could sit without moving for hours devouring whatever was on the screen. When Vanja was eighteen months old she watched her first movie from beginning to end. I remembered that because we traveled to Gotland the day after, it was the summer of 2005, the movie she saw was Pippi on the Run. I watched it with her, dropping off now and then, so it took on a dream-like quality, and ever since, as we had seen it many, many times, I connected it with a kind of dreaminess, the way all the impressions from those days, when we lived in the apartment in Regeringsgatan, came back to me in all their detail. Watching films with her, I always had my eye on the background in the picture, the houses, the forest, the road, the beach, and I found just enough of interest in it to watch a ninety-minute children's movie without getting bored. If it was a film from the seventies, such as Karlsson on the Roof or Elvis! Elvis!, my interest increased because the times, which were discernible in everything, were the first I could remember, they were when I grew up, they were my whole world, and now they were gone. The seventies, that sad, unsophisticated, restaurant-less, impoverished decade with rest stops and gravel roads, VW Beetles and the Citroën DS, one TV channel and one radio channel, when everything was state-owned and almost nothing commercial, when the shops closed at four and the banks at three and no one who earned money from sports was allowed to participate in the Olympics, those times were gone, and, seeing how the world had moved on, it was incredible to think that once upon a time all this existed. Even a tiny glimpse of that world filled me with pleasure and sadness. Pleasure that I had been alive then, sadness that it had disappeared. The beginning of Karlsson on the Roof, where Svante is playing in Tegnér Park in Stockholm, muddied the waters because I walked through this park almost every day and recognized all the houses and streets, they were the same, yet they weren't, they were no longer in the 1970s but the 2000s, and the question I was unable to answer was: where had the seventies gone? In my head, apparently, in the heads of all the others who had once been alive then, but only there? What was time in a film? What was time in a photograph? It became even more puzzling when we watched Elvis! Elvis! because Linda's mother had been in that film, she played the teacher, a woman in her midthirties, and it was impossible, absolutely impossible, to connect the woman in the film with the woman who was our children's grandmother. Her appearance was different, her body language was different, even the sound of her voice was different. Was it the same woman?

Nostalgia is an illness, but it belongs to the person through whom time is filtered, unpredictably and individually, with all the flaws and defects inherent in human beings. The era that had passed is located in pockets of consciousness, some hidden and unseen, like ponds in remote forests, some bright and familiar like houses on the forest edge, but all of them fragile and changeable, and they die when consciousness dies. Films were a curse because they belonged to everyone, and they were mechanical and unchangeable, storage space for an era, corpses passed from one generation to the next, and still so new that the consequences were unpredictable. Already there were thousands of films in which all the people who had taken part in them were dead. This was a new way to be dead, with your body, life, and soul captured on camera forever while the body had decomposed long ago and was gone. Films were a graveyard, a necropolis, but still a work in progress, for what would they be like in two hundred years, in five hundred years, in a thousand years? In my grandparents' time it had been only actors and famous people, by and large, who were immortalized on film, and that was easy to relate to, that their images would live on. But now everyone filmed everyone else, every day thousands of films were posted on the Net, and after we were gone how would it feel to our successors to be able to see us all the time? They would be swimming in dead bodies in quite a different way. This would inevitably change the whole view of death, the perception of what it meant to be dead, and ultimately the view of what it meant to be alive.

And time? What would happen to time if the past piled up? Would it eventually be so overwhelming that it would drive out the present? We could already see one consequence of this, that trends from earlier eras were returning, that the eighties, which in a different world would only have existed in individual consciousness, bound up with individual life, was recreated in collective forms of expression: fashion and music.

Despite these feelings, we still let the children watch almost as many films as they wanted. I wasn't proud of it, and I didn't like it, but the calm that settled over the apartment was too wonderful to resist. Besides, in my defense, I thought, they learned a lot from what they saw.

Well, maybe not from The Little Ghost Godfrey.

If the island were a person and the road an artery, we got on the bus on one of the fingers, I mused a few hours later as I gazed inland at the black rocky landscape; the road was narrow and the roads crossing it were also narrow and disappeared between the mountains in this deserted region. And the activities that took place here, in low brick buildings behind wire fences, were of no interest to anyone except for those involved. Then the road widened, there were more cars, we came to large intersections with bridges and roads that wound around and met others, the traffic infrastructure grew, the complexity increased, the intervals between signs became shorter, soon there were buildings and life everywhere, we were approaching the center, the place all and sundry flocked to, the heart of the island. We glided past sidewalks thronged with people, surrounded by cars, in streets that became narrower and narrower until we arrived at a large concrete bus station, where the bus came to a halt and we alighted.

The transition from the deserted, uneventful countryside to the center of a town is the same everywhere, whether it is from Tromøya to Arendal, Jølster to Bergen, Cromer to Norwich, or Norwich to London. It was like falling, the speed increased the closer you came to the hub, and even though it was an external phenomenon, it was impossible not to experience subjectively, which seemed to cause your insides to vibrate with activity too, that is how open we are to the world, it flows ceaselessly through us and leaves its mark on not only our thoughts and ideas, but also on our moods and emotions. There is no other way I can explain the pleasure that arose in me as we strolled into town and sat down at a sidewalk café, Linda and I with a coffee, the children with an ice cream; it was as though I had come out of myself, as if after a long, hard winter, everything suddenly was wonderful and carefree, I started chatting away, I might even have been laughing in the sunshine, why? Everything was the same. Linda was the same, the children were the same, the sun in the sky was the same one that had been there for the ten days our holiday had lasted. What wasn't the same were the surroundings. Parks with wizened old men dressed in dark suits sitting on benches in the shade, often smoking, always elegant; small, crooked seventeenth-century brick houses, cobbled streets, big dilapidated churches in open squares, priests and nuns fluttering past, old women in black, either skeletal or voluminous, sitting on a chair outside a door or on doorsteps inside an archway. Avenues of palm trees, buses full of tourists rumbling past, semis, trucks carrying cement mixers, tradesmen in pickups or small vans, boxlike cars from the eighties, sparkling new aerodynamic sedans, mopeds – endless mopeds. Functional sixties and seventies architecture, resplendent eighties architecture, restrained nineties architecture, almost dystopian with its great expanses of dark stone and glass.

The town wasn't big, but it was a capital, and it was Spanish, though separated from Spain by a sea and hence different, not in anything major but in the minor detail. You saw signs of the old days everywhere, as though time hadn't wrought such great changes here, hadn't flooded the town and changed it radically, as it had done in other Spanish cities, where the past was fenced off, preserved in specimens, but here it had just seeped in all over the place. In addition, the fact that the sea made its presence felt everywhere made me think that Las Palmas was like the old South American colonial towns, where I had never been but whose atmosphere I nonetheless believed I could recognize and which I had longed to see all my life.

I said as much to Linda. We were ambling across a cobbled square in front of a white church, Vanja ran over to a marble lion and climbed up it while Heidi crouched down in front of the water in a little fountain.

"There's something South American about the atmosphere here, don't you think?" I said. "It's as if you can imagine this is Buenos Aires. Not that I've been there, of course. It's just the feeling you get. A bit offbeat, slightly run-down, colonies, palm trees, but also modern. Spanish, but not Spain."

"I know what you mean," she said. "It's wonderful."

"It is."

"You're so happy. That makes me happy too."

"I'm sorry," I said. "I should be like this all the time. There's no reason to be any other way."

"We're not going to move to Buenos Aires then?" she said.

I laughed.

"No, seriously. Why not?"

"There's nothing I'd like to do more," I said. "But for someone who fears the slightest change I can think of better alternatives than moving to Argentina with three small children."

"It doesn't have to be like that," she said. "It might be fantastic. It might be just what we need."

"I'd do it at the drop of a hat."

"That's agreed then? We move there? At some point in the future, I mean."

"If you're fine with it, there's no reason not to," I said.

We followed one of the narrow, shaded streets, discovered a museum devoted to Columbus's expeditions to America, and entered, it was like an augury. An atrium with the sun flooding in, flowers along the walls, a little fountain with a murmur of running water in the middle. The museum was located in the surrounding rooms, we walked through them, dark and cool after the bright light outside, full of charts, models, a few artifacts from ships or the days of sailing glory. Heidi was tired, she shrieked at the slightest thing, so after a quick circuit we agreed I would go for a walk with

Heidi in the stroller to get her off to sleep while Linda and Vanja stayed there.

I walked down the shady side of the street, which opened, in narrow shafts, onto sun-filled yards or dark, tableau-like shopwindows where it wasn't always easy to establish which branch of commerce it was: a wooden torso dressed in servant's livery, was this attire an antiquity or an item that was sold to hotels? We emerged into a square, went to the right, and crossed a wide boulevard with trees that afforded some shade. Heidi was quiet, but her eyes were open.

"You need to sleep now, my girl," I said.

"No," she said.

"Well," I said, pushing her across another street into a park and out on the other side, where the modern center started. Something about the light above the part of town we had just left reminded me first of Stavanger, then Bergen. Not the light itself, I immediately realized, but the proximity to the sea, the feeling of how close it was.

What effect did this have on my thoughts?

The streets, the market squares, the houses, the apartments, the shops, the cafés, all the people occupying them and who occupy your mind as well.

Then the exoticism all around you.

How frightening it must have been for Columbus and his men when they docked at the harbor here, the last outpost before the unknown. They didn't know what lay out there. How terrified they must have been!

I leaned forward and looked at Heidi, who still had her eyes open. I placed my hand on her chest.

"You can sleep if you like," I said. "You're tired, aren't you?"

She didn't say anything, she didn't react to my touch, just sat still staring at everything around us. H&M, Sony, Adidas, Zara. Glass gleamed, music blared from the open doorways, and as we passed them I could also feel that particular coldness that air-conditioning has. There were people everywhere. But no one with a stroller. I was the only person pushing one!

No, I wasn't. There was one. Black and attractive, with a little infant inside wearing a lace dress. The woman pushing the stroller was young and walking beside another woman, perhaps her sister, they were talking earnestly and intensely about something in the midst of a stream of besuited men and shorts-clad tourists. Then they were gone. I walked the length of the pedestrian street and by the time I reached the café where we had been that morning, next to the park, Heidi was asleep. I parked the stroller by a table, ordered a double espresso, and flipped out a cigarette, retrieved the Gombrowicz book from my backpack, but only managed a few lines, it felt wrong to read where there was so much to look at.

A suntanned man in his sixties with thinning sandy hair was reading a newspaper at a table close by. It was Verdens Gang. He looked up and met my gaze.

"Are you Norwegian?" I said.

"Yes," he said.

It was so rare for me to initiate a conversation with a stranger. Apart from when I was drunk, of course. Now I felt so light and carefree that it was the most natural thing in the world.

"You too?" he said.

"Yes. Well, I live in Sweden, but I'm Norwegian."

"Here on holiday?"

"Yes. I take it you aren't?"

"No, I live here. The climate, you know. Sun and warmth all year round. I was sick of shoveling snow."

"I can understand that," I said.

He took a long swig of beer and lit a cigarette.

"And it's so lovely and cheap here. Buying a packet of cigarettes doesn't spell financial ruin."

"Do you live here in town?"

"Oh, no, no. I live farther north. I have a place in a little town there." He wore a lightweight gray jacket, a blue shirt, and a pair of Dressmann-style trousers underneath. He wasn't exactly scruffy, but nobody would call him well dressed. His shirt was wrinkled and I spotted a couple of dark stains on the breast of his jacket.

I told him the name of the hotel complex where we were staying and asked if his town lay nearby. He shook his head, took another swig of beer, and wiped his lip with a finger.

"I live on the other side."

"Many other Norwegians there?" I asked.

"There are a few of us, yes."

"So do you go home in the summer?"

"Many do. Not me though. I'm a resident."

There was an air of loneliness about him, perhaps also of unhappiness. The well-meaning friendly glint in his eye vanished as soon as he turned away.

"Are you happy here?" I said.

"Yes, I am," he said. "I don't have to shovel snow anyway."

"No, that's true," I said.

"We do actually get a little sometimes, but it doesn't settle, you know. It melts right away."

"Yes," I said.

He pulled another cigarette from the packet and raised it to his mouth. The hand holding the lighter trembled slightly.

I pretended to start reading again to give him some peace. But I was aware of his presence the whole time, whether I was staring toward the park, along the pedestrian street, or down at my book. He was my father's age, and although he hadn't reached the same state as my father, something about him was the same.

They came here to live in peace for their remaining years.

I looked down at Heidi, placed my hand on her head, just to touch her.

Once, a couple of years before he died, some friends of Mom's sister Kjellaug ran into Dad in the Canaries, in a bar, as far as I remembered, they had recognized him while he had no idea who they were. They'd started talking, he said he was a seaman but he'd come ashore now.

When Mom told me that, she had smiled because, as she put it, there was a lot of truth in what he said.

In the park a girl came up the dusty path, a boy on a bench sat up straight, he was almost glowing, and sure enough the very next moment they stood in an embrace, then they sat down next to each other, full to the brim with conversation and gestures. I glanced at the man beside me, he was reading the sports pages, then he looked up at the waiter, who placed another beer on his table.

I leaned back, stared up at the cloudless blue sky, lit a cigarette, inhaled, and blew the smoke out with relish. I always smoked Chesterfield abroad, it was my favorite brand, but they weren't sold in either Sweden or Norway apart from at Sørensen Tobakk on Torgallmenningen in Bergen, where they had been so expensive I could only afford them when my student loan arrived.

A beer would have been a pleasure.

But not with Heidi asleep in the stroller.

Anyhow, I would have to get back to Linda and Vanja soon.

Another quarter of an hour.

I caught the waiter's eye, he came over, I ordered another double espresso, took my notebook and a pen from my backpack, described the trees in the park, first the shadows they cast over the parched, dusty ground, tried to make out what color the shadows really were, if the green of the sparse grass or the faintly reddish soil rubbed off on them, then I made a note of the dry, cracked, and probably brittle bark on one tree, the smoother, shinier bark on the second, and then the way the trunk seemed to cleave into branches, thinner and thinner until they became the small, trembling twigs at the farthermost ends. The way the sunlight seemed to be poured out over the leaves at the crown, as if from a bucket, and trickled down through the layers of foliage until it dripped down onto the ground below.

When I moved to Stockholm I went for a walk in Haga Park one morning with Geir, my new friend, it must have been mid-May because it was warm, but I still hadn't got together with Linda. We had walked from the Copper Tent and down the hill, along the big grassy slope where people lay sunbathing everywhere and into a more wooded area. I had started talking about all the fantastic trees that grew here. How individual they were, each with its very own shape, yet how alike, they shared the same features, both as trees generally and within the various species. How alive they were, just standing here in our midst, although we never thought of them as such, as living beings, or ever talked about them. Most of them were much older than we were, I said, some of these are from the nineteenth century, maybe even the eighteenth. Isn't that incredible? They are here, like us, but in a very different state. A very different form of life. We wonder whether there is life in outer space, what sort of weird and wonderful forms of life might exist there while we walk around among these fantastic creatures every day!

Geir burst into laughter.

"You know what everyone looks at these days, don't you?"

I shook my head.

"There are women lying all over the place. Many of them are beautiful. And most have only a bikini on. And there's you, looking at trees! Wake up, my boy!"

"There's no contradiction in that, surely?"

"Yes, there is. One is biology within the human domain. The other is biology outside the human domain. You're human."

"That's someone talking who can feel the sap rising. The difference is not as great as you imagine."

"Oh yes, it is. I don't know anyone who effuses about trees. No one! And over time I've gotten to know a lot of people."

"It doesn't mean I don't think about women."

"Are you offended?" he said with a laugh.

"A bit maybe," I said. "I don't think it's as unusual as you make out. There's even a weekly magazine about it."

"Oh?"

"Yes. Woman & Tree."

"Ha ha ha. I can remember someone who used to run around this park hunting for trees. A friend of mine in sociology. He had to organize a stag night and the idea was they were going to play volleyball here. He ran around with a tape measure looking for two trees exactly the same distance apart as the net posts on a volleyball court. He's the biggest pedant I've ever met, so he wouldn't accept any approximations. No, the measurement had to be exact. I hardly need to tell you it took him an incredibly long time to write his thesis."

"He's an aberration. Talking about trees as you walk past them isn't."

"Sure it is. He stayed within the human domain. A game, a relationship between two entities. You talk about trees per se. To me all life is social. I'm not in the slightest bit interested in what lies outside. It's pointless."

We'd had this discussion at regular intervals over the four years that had passed since then. The material world with its stones, grains of sand, and stars or the biological world with its lynxes, beetles, and bacteria didn't interest him in the slightest unless it could tell him something about humanity. I, on the other hand, was always drawn to those realms where consciousness and identity were no longer operative, both inside the body – where the self appeared to go in two directions, toward the particular, in other words, all the processes that sustained themselves, as though humans consisted of many different animals, coordinated by one of the oldest and most primitive parts of the brain, and toward the general and shared, as all these organs and processes were the same for all – and outside the body, that is the world the body became part of the moment it ceased to exist. Geir did not accept any of this, and if his voice or facial expression didn't become weary with impatience whenever I talked about it, this was purely a result of his interest being focused on me, the social creature preoccupied with such matters.

The man at the neighboring table got to his feet, folded up his newspaper, tucked it under his arm, and glanced over at me.

"Have a good holiday," he said.

"Thank you," I said.

He walked briskly down to the pedestrian street, stood slightly stooped waiting for a green light at the crossing, and the next time I looked he had been swallowed up by the town.

On the way back to the museum I kept an eye open for a restaurant where we could have lunch, found a nice old one full of elderly islanders, but its rustic charm was outshone by the neighboring restaurant which had a little terraza where customers were served, beside a busy main road admittedly, however that was compensated for by the shade from the trees and the crooked walls of the building, against which a waiter leaned with a cigarette between his fingers while his colleagues ran in and out with trays full of food and drink.

When I entered the atrium of the museum Linda and Vanja were sitting on the bench by the wall squinting into the sun.

"Well, we've been having fun and games," Linda said as I pressed down on the stroller's brake.

"Oh yes?" I said, sitting beside her.

"Would you like to tell him, Vanja?"

"I dropped my shark down the cannon," Vanja said.

"No, you threw it down on purpose," Linda said. "We couldn't get it out," she said, turning to me. "And you know how attached she is to it."

"Yes, I do," I said.

"Then we went in to see if we could get someone to help us."

"In those cannons there?" I said, nodding toward the two big verdigrised cannons by the opposite wall.

"Yes, exactly. Columbus's cannons."

"Are they?"

"Yes. The cannons that were on the ships that discovered America. That's where our daughter dropped her shark hairbrush."

"What happened then?"

"There was a huge fuss and palaver. All the staff came out to help. They lifted the cannon down and it banged against the wall and the cannon cracked. But in the end the shark came out. You should've seen their faces when they saw that what we'd lost was a hairbrush!"

"Good thing I wasn't here. I would've died of shame."

She laughed.

"But they didn't seem to mind. They were just happy to help. You know what it's like with children here. They love children so much they'd do anything for them."

"Are you sure? They're not inside now, fuming? I mean, cracking Columbus's cannon?"

"I got my shark back!" Vanja said, narrowing her eyes and smiling.

"But now I'm starving. Shall we go and get something to eat?" Linda said.

I nodded, got up, and wheeled over the stroller. Vanja jumped up and then our little cavalcade trundled out of the museum.

Throughout our meal the wind tugged and tore at the tablecloth. The paper napkins flew into the air several times, but one of the waiters always managed to pick them up before I could get to my feet. We talked about the future awaiting us in Buenos Aires, and it was nice, perhaps the nicest time since we had moved to Malmö the summer before, and everything, including our lives, was bathed in the light of newness. After we had eaten and were waiting for our coffee, I told her about the restaurant next door, how beautiful it was with its thick brick walls and wooden benches and, with Heidi in her arms, she went in while I sat with Vanja, who was busy blowing down her straw, making her soda bubble and froth, but she didn't seem to be doing it for fun, her expression was rather one of preoccupation and stubborn perseverance.

I racked my brains for something to say to her.

Cars whooshed past on the road. A nun appeared at the entrance to a street and was gone again. The tall, slim conifers swayed in the wind. I took an apple from my backpack and placed it on the table between us.

"Did you know that some apples can talk?" I said.

She looked up at me without moving her head. Her eyes were skeptical, though not totally dismissive.

"When I was walking with Heidi I heard a voice in my backpack, you know. I'm not sure, but I think it was the apple. If so, we're so incredibly lucky because there are hardly any apples that can talk. But I think this one can. Do you know how small the chances are of that?"

She shook her head, her eyes fixed on me.

"They can't speak human language. That's obvious. You didn't think they could, did you?"

She shook her head again.

"They speak applish. Look, if I shake it a bit, it might say something. Shall I try?"

She pushed her glass away.

"It can't speak," she said. "You're teasing me."

"No, I'm not. It's very unusual. That's probably why you've never heard of it."

I gave a start.

"There! Did you hear it?"

She stared at the apple, shaking her head. I lifted the apple to my ear and made big eyes.

"It said something," I said.

"No, it didn't," she laughed. "It did not."

"Yes, it did. Here, you listen."

I held up the apple and she leaned over and put her ear to it.

"Can you hear anything?" I said.

She shook her head.

"Daddy," she said. "Apples can't talk."

"It just did," I said.

"What did it say then?"

"I'm not sure. It was applish. But I think it said, 'I'm so lonely.'"

"You can't speak applish."

"Yes, I can. Not very well. But I understand a little."

"How did you learn it?"

"I picked bits up here and there. There were lots and lots of apple trees where I grew up."

"You're teasing me."

"Listen. Did you hear that?"

She gave a tentative smile and shook her head.

"It said, 'What a lovely girl. What's her name?'"

"My name's Vanja."

"Vanja," I squeaked.

"That was you," Vanja said. "It can't talk."

I began to feel sorry for her.

"You're right, it was," I said. "Did you think apples could talk?"

"No," she laughed.

"Are you sure?" I said, lifting the apple to my mouth and taking a bite.

"Don't eat it!" she said.

"But I was just teasing you," I said. "It's only an apple."

"OK," she said.

The waiter came with two cups of coffee and two bowls of ice cream. Vanja started hers as soon as he put the bowl in front of her. I said thank you and looked up, but he didn't meet my gaze, walked over with bowed head to the table beside us, set the plates on his right arm, stacked the glasses, which he carried in his left hand, and disappeared into the darkness of the restaurant.

"I want to blow," Vanja said.

I pushed the cup over to her, she blew, I took a sip. Linda appeared from around the corner, still carrying Heidi on her hip. She looked flustered.

"I fell over inside," she said. "Right onto my side. With Heidi in my arm as well."

"Did you hurt yourself?"

"A little," she said, putting Heidi in the high chair. I pushed her ice cream over to her. "It's a tiled floor. I think Heidi got a bang too. Or perhaps it was mostly a fright. Anyway, there was quite a commotion in there. Everyone rushed over to help me. Not so strange, I suppose. A pregnant woman with a child in her arm falling on the floor. I toppled over. Like a boat heeling to one side. Then all these kind people came running over to help me to my feet and they brushed me down and asked me how I was."

"Sounds very dramatic," I said.

"It was. And I felt so helpless. Suddenly not being able to walk. Do you know what I mean?"

"Yes."

"You don't see any children here. God knows where they are. Not here anyway. Then I come along with a child in my belly and one in my arm and right in front of everyone, bang. I felt so Scandinavian."

In the bus going home Vanja slept with her head in Linda's lap while Heidi sat limply on mine dozing. Her little body registered all the bus's jerks and jolts as at first we drove from traffic light to traffic light through the town, then onto the motorway along the coast where the blazing sun hung above the dark blue sea.

Happiness isn't in my nature, but happy was how I felt.

Everything was light and airy, my emotions were lofty and uncomplicated, the mere sight of a bulging wire fence or a stack of worn tires outside a garage opened my soul, and a rare warmth spread through my insides.

What effect does happiness have?

Happiness erases. Happiness erodes. Happiness overflows. All that is difficult, all that usually hinders or limits us, disappears inside happiness. In the long term it's unbearable because there is no resistance in happiness, if you lean against it, you will fall.

Where do you fall?

Into open space, my friend.

I looked at Linda, she had leaned back against the seat and closed her eyes. Vanja's face was covered with her hair; she lay like a tuft of grass on Linda's lap.

I bent forward a little and peeked at Heidi, who stared back without interest.

I loved them. This was my gang.

My family.

In terms of pure biomass, we were nothing special. Heidi weighed perhaps ten kilos, Vanja maybe twelve, plus Linda's and my weight we constituted something like one hundred and ninety kilos. That was considerably less than a horse, I imagined, and about the same as a mature male gorilla. If we lay close together our physical bulk was nothing to shout about either, a sea lion was bulkier. In terms of intangible factors, however – which was the essence of a family – in other words everything connected with thoughts, dreams, and feelings, the family's inner life, the aggregate was explosive, and spread over time, which was the relevant dimension to see the family in, it would cover an almost endless surface area. Once I met my great-grandmother, which meant that Vanja and Heidi and the new baby belonged to the fifth generation, and if fate was kind, they could in their turn witness three further generations, so this little pile of flesh numbered eight generations, or two hundred years, with all the concomitant changing cultural and social conditions, not to mention how many people it included. A whole little world was what was moving along the highway at great speed this late-spring afternoon, my own little family, which might eventually develop its own special characteristics, something typical only of us, as I had encountered many times in other families and always envied: their security and goodness and contentment.

When the children had gone to sleep we moved closer and were near each other in the darkness. Linda's eyes were wide open, the way I remembered them from the first weeks we were together, somehow bare and defenseless. Afterward we went onto the balcony, me with the beer that had become a habit during the ten days we had been there, Linda with a ginger ale. The darkness seemed to hover in the air, which became grayer and dimmer by the minute as stars appeared in the sky one after the other, hesitantly, a little shyly, as though they didn't really trust the memory of how they had shone the previous night, proud and firm and minerally unforgiving. But, bit by bit, the memory came back to them and soon the whole of the now black sky was full of sparkling lights.

"I think I'll go to bed," Linda said, getting up. "Thank you for everything today. Would you like me to switch on the light for you?"

"Please," I said. "Goodnight."

"Goodnight, my prince."

The light came on, her footsteps faded into the bedroom, I sat down on the chair and put my feet on the railing. What if Columbus had turned around when they discovered America? I wondered. What if they had said they would leave the continent intact and allow those living there to continue their lives in peace? What if they had said they wouldn't exploit its riches and its people? Then America would only have existed as a concept in old Europe, in Asia and Africa. There is an enormous continent out there, to the west, every new generation would learn. We have no idea what goes on there. Nor what it looks like, what species of plants and animals exist there, or what people think about life and existence. We know nothing of this and we won't find out.

I had never considered a more impossible thought. It would go against everything we were.

But it would have been so fantastic. A secret, undiscovered continent no one had opened up or exploited but had just left in peace. What an incredible shadow of ignorance that would have cast over our European brains.

I finished my beer, stubbed out my cigarette, and stood for a moment holding the balcony railing looking into the darkness behind the light from the bungalows, at the sea that stretched into the distance.

Then I, too, went to bed.

Two nights later the plane left for home, it was packed, and we felt stressed with all our baggage and our two small children, but we got on board and after a few minutes in the air both Vanja and Heidi fell asleep. We sank back in our seats. The plane flew through the black sky, lights flashing. The mood on board was strange, many passengers were feverishly drinking and talking in loud voices and laughing, probably trying to squeeze every last minute out of their vacation, others slept. After half an hour the captain made an announcement over the intercom, asking everyone to sit down and fasten their seat belts, we were entering a spot of turbulence. Vanja woke up and started crying. It wasn't a low, whiny cry, she screamed from the bottom of her lungs. That woke Heidi, who also started crying. Suddenly there was an inferno around us. Linda and I frenetically tried to calm them down, but nothing was any use, they were caught up in something they couldn't get out of and just kept screaming. People tolerated it for the first few minutes, but after a quarter of an hour the displeasure and annoyance around us were palpable. Why couldn't we get our godforsaken kids to shut up? Why were they screaming like that? Were we bad parents? It was unbearable, and when the seat belt sign was switched off I asked Linda to stand up so that I could carry Heidi into the central aisle, she did, I undid Heidi's belt and lifted her up, she resisted, twisted and squirmed, her whole body as tense as a spring, while Vanja was kicking the seat in front of her. I squeezed through the narrow gap between the seats, bent double, with Heidi held firmly to my chest, wriggling and screaming in my ear, finally emerged in the aisle, made my way through to where there was a measure of space, but Heidi wasn't happy, she didn't want to walk, didn't want to be carried, didn't want any candy, didn't want to see what was behind the curtain, she just wanted to scream and scream, her face bright red, legs kicking in all directions. People were no longer hiding their irritation, they were staring at me with obvious animosity, a man who couldn't control his child. I forced Heidi back into her seat, the man in front of us turned and told us to stop the kid kicking him, which infuriated Linda, she's four, she shouted, I placed a hand on her shoulder, a flight attendant leaned over us with some toys, Vanja threw them away, in a rage. I was drenched in sweat. The girls were caught in a fit and couldn't get out of it, and all I could think was: what must the other passengers be thinking. It was obvious we were bad parents, why would children scream like this otherwise? Their childhood must be terrible, traumatizing. Something had to be wrong. I had never seen other children behaving like this in public. The situation was acute, we had to get them to stop, but none of our methods was helping, it was like throwing gasoline on a fire. This situation was chronic, it was a symptom of something else, which chafed away incessantly behind my sweaty forehead. I felt like "white trash" on a charter trip to Gran Canaria with my neglected children. Everything was out of control, and in a very confined area to make matters worse.

They kept it up for a good hour. Then they stopped. First Vanja, afterwards Heidi. They sat staring into space, sweaty and exhausted. I couldn't believe it was true and didn't dare move a muscle. A few minutes later they fell asleep, and seven hours later we were able to tuck them into their own beds in our apartment. Absolutely drained, we looked at each other and promised we would never, ever, under any circumstances, do anything like this again. But then, slowly and imperceptibly, all the hassle around the journey and the vulgarity of the holiday center was forgotten; what remained of the two weeks was the children's pleasure in the pool, the evenings on the balcony, the trip to Las Palmas.

John was born, and Linda stayed at home with him while I took the girls to school and brought them home every morning and afternoon, I worked at home during the intervening six hours, partly on a translation of the Bible, partly on a novel I was making no headway with, until the following spring, when I started writing about myself. Linda sat on the office chair, in the darkness after the children were in bed, listening to me reading from it, she said it was "heady stuff." At the end of the summer, which was John's first, we went to see Yngve in Voss, then my mother in Jølster, and plans for my fortieth had been forged behind my back. It was to be a small party – twenty or so people is not a lot – but for me it was overwhelming. We had set up a long table in the sitting room, and when all the guests had assembled in another room, glass of champagne in hand, and we were about to welcome them, I had thought of saying they were all characters in a novel I was writing and that everything they did and said over the evening would be used against them, but I didn't have the courage, I said nothing, Linda made the speech, I stood beside her, smiling. Tore spoke, Geir G. and Espen spoke, Linda sang, and Yngve was in despair when he realized that my wish for no speeches was being ignored and that he, as the brother, appeared to be neglecting his duty. I told him it didn't matter. Later in the evening he got together with Knut Olav, Hans, and Tore and gave a little concert, they played one Kafkatrakterne song, one Lemen song, and one ABBA hit. For the rest of the night we danced and drank, I danced for the first time in what must have been fifteen years, and when we went to bed, at about seven in the morning, I was happy and thinking this had been the beginning of something. On New Year's Eve, three weeks later, Geir and Christina got married in Malmö, and had their wedding party in our place, that too as low profile as possible: there were six adults and five children around the table. The idea was that they would stay with us for a few days afterward, but they left in the evening of New Year's Day, Linda's brother, Mathias, had called, he asked to speak to Linda, I said she was resting, he said it was important, their father had died, could I wake her up?

Today is August 26, 2011. It is 5:59. I am writing this in an unfurnished loft in Glemmingebro, in what we have begun to call the "summer house" as it isn't insulated. I have just been to the main house to wake Linda up; in two hours Vanja and Heidi go to school. It is a stone's throw away and there are only thirty pupils in total in the four classes. We never planned to move here, it just happened, like so much else. The plan was that we would have the house as a summer residence, come here every weekend and holiday, but only eight months after we had taken it over we moved in. So now we live here, right out in the country. I get up at four every morning, have a cup of coffee and a smoke before coming over here, into the freezing-cold loft, then I write until eight, when I take Vanja and Heidi to school, and afterward have a thirty-minute nap before resuming my writing for the rest of the day. In the afternoon and evening I'm in the garden, I have been going wild cutting down trees and bushes in the central part, where, it transpired, there were beautiful flagstone paths, completely hidden by soil and undergrowth. I removed the worst, and last week I sowed grass, which has already started coming up. On the first afternoon I cleared away the branches and twigs, tore up bushes and plants, I couldn't stop; at nine the children were hanging out the window in their pajamas asking me what I was doing running back and forth, dragging whole trees after me, and I didn't stop until close to midnight, and it has been like that ever since; once I start working I don't want to stop, and I have to force myself to go to bed to ensure I have enough strength to write the following day. That was what my father did when I was a boy, he was always in the garden working, and I was never able to understand why – what could it possibly give him? – until now. Previously I thought it was boring, a duty, and when for example I helped my mother at home or when we were at the cabin it was a chore, I always preferred to sit and read. Now I understand. From the outside, and invariably I did regard my father and what he did from the outside, gardening is the very symbol of bourgeois stasis, utterly ridiculous and superficial, an artificial way of ordering the world's chaos by limiting the world to a lawn and a few bushes and subjugating them completely. The garden is also part of your private life others can see and therefore functions as a kind of display window for those around. In other words, a façade.

Yesterday I sat in the garden reading a text Yngve had written about the Aller Værste! and their album Materialtretthet, in which he also interviewed the surviving band members about that period. One of them, I think it was Harald Øhrn, described himself as a vagabond, a man who had lived the life of a vagabond. That instant the attraction was back: seeing the world open up before you, always traveling, no roots, only that, the world continuing to open. That was what I dreamed of when I was in my teens, but I didn't know what it was and I never realized the dream. The band they had in 1979 was about that, the freedom to do exactly what they wanted, completely unfettered by anything that had gone before. Chris Erichsen put it best, punk was about out with the old, all history, all the old heroes, all the bygones, and in with the new, what is here, right now, this is what counts, follow it wherever it may lead. This is what it is like being twenty, everything is open, but as that which isn't open still hasn't revealed itself, you don't know about it, what it entails, until it is too late, and then the next generation has the world at their feet while you putter around in a suburban garden with children and a car and perhaps soon even a dog, if our eldest gets her way, which of course she will.

That is how I felt yesterday as I read Yngve's text with Heidi swinging under an apple tree and occasionally shouting whatever came into her head at me, for example she asked me if I knew what she was going to be when she was big. No, I said. I'm going to be a pixie, she shouted. She laughed at that for a long time. I said it sounded like a good idea, and read on. Taking life into your own hands: not studying, not working, just jamming with a few pals in a band. Or traveling down through Europe, finding a job, earning some money, always on the move.

That was the attraction. It was about being open to the world, letting what happened, happen, and not being governed by the fixed structures that education, job, children, and a house constituted, this calcification of life that came with institutions: school for your children, hospital and a care home for your parents perhaps, a job for you.

So when I was running around the garden like a crazy man, with a petty-bourgeois fire burning in my insides, not dissimilar to my father, although his beard was thick and mine wispy, his upper torso strong and mine weak, it was hard to regard this as anything other than an escape inward. Yet there was something about it that I liked. The smell of soil, all the worms and beetles wriggling and crawling in it, the pleasure of a big branch falling to the ground and the light flooding across the previously overshadowed flagstones, the children wandering over sometimes to see what I was doing or to say something to me.

I'd had the chance when I was twenty. I hadn't taken it. Now they had the chance. Now it was their turn. It was their future.

This is the voice of resignation speaking here, but also of necessity and sudden insight: this is how it must always have been. I never knew. But someone has always known, for someone has always been there. Ulysses deals with this as well, the difference between being the son, which Stephen Dedalus is, and being the father, which Leopold Bloom is. Stephen outdoes Bloom in everything, but not in this. Leopold has nothing of Stephen's yearnings and aspirations, he doesn't want anything else, he's at home. Leopold is a complete person, Stephen Dedalus an incomplete person. Only Stephen can create, for to create is to want everything, to create is to want to come home, and the whole person doesn't feel that unrest, that urge, those yearnings. Hamlet, like Stephen, is a son and actually no more than that. It is his father's death that triggers his crisis and his mother's desertion that keeps it alive. Hamlet has no home. Jesus wasn't a father either, but a son, and he had no home. Hamlet, Stephen, Jesus, Kafka, Proust were all sons, not fathers. So there was something about being human that they didn't know and perhaps didn't know about either. But what was it? What is it to be a father? Being a father is a commitment, so it is possible to have children without being a father. But what are you committing yourself to? You have to be at your post; you have to be at home. Yearnings and aspirations are irreconcilable with this because what you hunger for is limitless and what home does is set limits. A father without limits is no father, but a man with children. A man without limits is a child, that is, the eternal son. The eternal son takes or gets, he doesn't give, and he takes or gets because he isn't whole and he isn't his own person. It is not some accidental detail that Dad moved into his mother's house before he died; he died a son. He had abrogated his responsibility as a father, and you can only do that if paternal duty is an external entity, a role you have assumed out of obligation. I believe that is how it was for him. He didn't want to be there. He became a father at twenty and must have suppressed all his urges to break with propriety, combated all the yearnings and aspirations because that aggression, that anger and frustration he had, which characterized my whole childhood, could only exist in someone who didn't want to be there, who didn't want to do what he was doing. If that was so, he had sacrificed his entire young adult life, the years between twenty and forty, doing something he didn't want to do but was forced to do. I was sixteen, as good as grown up, when he left the family, which suggests he took his responsibilities seriously. But he was no father, he was a son. He wasn't whole, he had no inner peace, none of the inner gravity adults have. Mom was also twenty when she became a mother, but she was an adult or grew into adulthood with the responsibilities that came. She was also his mother, in the sense that she set his limits, which was what he was unable to do himself, and no sons can. This is a simple explanation, but I believe it to be true. Linda's father was without limits in a very different way: he had been diagnosed as a manic depressive, which is as good as a complete disclaimer of any responsibility for his own life, since the self cannot control the mania's frenzied activity and the depression's inactivity, there is something inside that constantly drives the self up or down, which means it is never present, it either expands into the world or implodes, and of course the disclaimer applies to the lives of his children as well. Both Linda and I were the children of sons, and we had experienced firsthand fathers without limits, Linda from the time she was quite small, me from the age of sixteen, but actually also from the time when I was quite small, as what I witnessed and experienced with respect to Dad was a limitless man setting limits, which in the absence of any inner peace or gravity were defined by the outside, and for someone born in 1944, this was the authoritarian, rule-setting father. The mother of Linda's father died when he was thirteen and he alone had been responsible for his siblings. He had been in the hospital when she died, he had been lying beside her on the bed. He'd been very attached to his mother and perhaps it was as simple as this: his attachment never weakened because her life ceased before he had cut himself free. It remained strong inside him, I suppose. I don't know, I met him only three times. Once in our apartment in Regeringsgatan, once in his apartment, and once by chance on the street. He was a warm, open person, perhaps too open for his own good. In my life with Linda he was a distant figure, I imagined she had distanced herself from him long ago because she had no choice. When she was in her midtwenties she too was diagnosed with manic depression, or bipolar disorder, as it is called, and had spent more than a year in the hospital. Her increasingly intense life was suddenly out of control, as though she had fallen over the edge. She fell into the limitless. It was one of the options in her life, one of the paths that were open to her. When we met, the manic phase had passed and was over. At that time her father was living alone in an apartment only a hundred meters from ours, somehow outside the community, because he hadn't had a job for many years, from when he fell ill, and he had organized his life in the best way he could for himself. He died alone in a new apartment, just after moving in. It was New Year's Eve. By the time Linda found out, it was New Year's Day, she sat down on the hall floor with her back against the wall. The children were asleep. She wept. Christina and Geir packed their bags and left to give us some space. In the night I woke to Linda crying beside me, I stroked her back and fell asleep again. I didn't realize that for the next three weeks she went through exactly the same thing as I had gone through with my father, when he'd died eleven years earlier. She traveled to Stockholm, dealt with the undertakers, dealt with the solicitor, pored over her father's worldly goods in the apartment with her brother Mathias, and grieved. She mourned the loss of her father, but I, her husband, wasn't there for her. I was writing. And what was I writing about? I was writing about the death of my father, which at that time, eleven years ago, had consumed me totally, darkened my life, and it still consumed me. When it happened to Linda I saw it from a great distance, and my attempts to console her and be sympathetic were mechanical. When it came to the crunch, I failed her. I told myself my role was to take care of the children and I had to write, not only for my own sake, but for the family's, we needed the money. I was also angry with Linda and had been for a long time. But sometimes you have to be big enough to rise above the trivial and the mundane, all the pettiness and self-absorption in which we live our lives, or at least I do, because now, when it really counts, when it is a life-or-death situation, the minutiae don't matter and the person who clings to them is small-minded.

On the morning before the funeral we caught a plane to Stockholm. John was a year and a half old, Heidi was three and a half, Vanja approaching five. A friend of Linda's had given us the use of her apartment, which the children reduced to bedlam within seconds. Late in the afternoon Linda's mother, Ingrid, arrived, then Linda's brother, Mathias. We shared a bottle of wine and talked for a couple of hours. Mathias, a warm, attentive person, asked me how my writing was going. I said I was busy with an autobiographical novel and he was in it. His eyes widened. Linda said with a smile that she thought I was performing a character assassination on her in the novel. I countered that she had the right of veto, if she wanted something excised all she had to do was say so. Mathias said Linda could use the veto on his behalf as well. I had such a bad conscience about what I had written that I decided there and then to delete everything to do with them. They were so kind! And on the following day they were going to bury their father and Ingrid's ex-husband. Who was I to write about them in such a vulnerable situation? The whole time we were sitting there the children kept wandering in and out of the other room, where they were watching a film on a laptop. Heidi sat on my lap staring impishly at Mathias for long periods at a time; Vanja stayed with her grandmother and ignored Mathias, while John was devouring him with his eyes and only turned away for a second when Mathias lifted him in the air, then John burst into laughter as Mathias threw him up toward the ceiling.

Mathias and Linda discussed the final preparations for the following day, we talked briefly about whether we should let Ingrid look after the children for an hour while we adjourned to a nearby café, but we decided to stay, and after mother and son had left, we tucked in the children and went to bed early ourselves. That is I sat up reading as everyone around me slept, Carl-Johan Vallgren's new novel Kunzelmann & Kunzelmann, a contemporary thriller I'd bought the day before on the basis of a review it had received on Swedish TV: Ingrid Elam had said, "I don't think much of this," which was a mark of quality for me. And it was great sitting there reading in the darkened flat, under the light of a single lamp, surrounded by the breathing of tiny people, without a thought for anything except the story, which was narrated so deftly and with such energy.

The next day I put on my black suit, and got the girls into their best dresses and their winter gear, which fortunately we'd had the presence of mind to bring along, outside, a gale was blowing, a cross between rain and sleet, into the back of the waiting taxi, buckle the children in, twenty kilometers to Skogskyrkogården Cemetery, with Ingrid and Mathias, and Helena, who had come along to help us with John during the ceremony. We arrived an hour before the proceedings were due to start. Just inside the walls surrounding the chapel there was a little house, where we left our things while Vanja and Helena's one-year-older daughter, Blanca, ran between the trees playing, with Heidi bringing up the rear, a little hesitantly. Linda and Mathias went into the chapel to see what it was like and to speak to the undertaker.

While they were inside a vehicle stopped on the other side of the cemetery. One man opened the rear door, another came to help, together they carefully lifted a coffin onto a bier.

The coffin contained Linda's father.

Slowly the two men in black rolled the coffin along a flagstone path between the green fir trees, which swayed to and fro in the wind. The men came to a halt in front of the doors, opened them, and trundled the bier into the chapel. I just glimpsed them gently lifting the coffin onto the catafalque at the opposite end of the little room before the doors closed. I turned my head to look for the girls. They were running between the trees, easy to spot against the dirty gray snow covering the ground. The doors opened again, the two men in black came out, strolled over to the hearse on the other side of the fence, and got in. The rear lights went red as the engine started up. The sky above the green fir trees was a leaden gray.

The vehicle slowly passed down the road and was gone. It struck me that there was the quality of a monument about the stone chapel, despite its diminutive size. The aesthetics of the twenties, this spirit of Blood and Soil, Nordic forests and heroic deaths lay over the whole of the enormous cemetery grounds.

Linda and Mathias returned. I looked down, not wishing to intrude on their grief. Linda suggested the children should eat something, a banana or a mandarin. The fruit was in my backpack, which I had left at home.

"I forgot to bring my backpack," I said.

"WHAT?" Linda said, staring at me furiously.

"What did you put in it?" I asked. "Anything important?"

I thought maybe the book with the poem she was going to read or something vital for the ceremony. But no, only some food and diapers.

"That's just perfect," she said angrily. "Well, no one can rely on you!"

I was fuming, but the circumstances were a mitigating factor, even I understood that, in forty minutes her father would be buried, so I kept my mouth shut.

"Give me a cigarette," she said.

"I don't have any," I said.

"You're a smoker. Why don't you have any cigarettes today of all days?"

"Because you took them this morning. You put them in your jacket. I imagine they're still there."

"No," she said, patting her pockets. "Oh, yes, here they . . ."

Then she went out and disappeared behind the waiting room while Helena avoided looking at me.

"I'll take John and try to get him off to sleep," I said. She nodded, I pushed the stroller onto the path and walked back and forth with him – peering up from beneath a pile of clothes and blankets – for twenty minutes as the icy wind howled through the thin material of my suit and the slush I was trudging through soaked my flimsy shoes. On my return, with John asleep in the stroller, I was frozen, colder than I had been in years. The first mourners had arrived, I shook their hands, Linda's husband, I said, yes, we've heard about you, they replied. Fifteen of them, plus the children, stood gathered around the coffin later. Mathias laid a scarf on the coffin from the football club his father had played for in his youth, we sat down, a harpist played Bach, Vanja and Heidi stared with big eyes. But they knew they had to be quiet, and when Heidi wanted to say something to me she did so in a whisper. Mathias raised his head now and then, as though gasping for air, his face distorted in sudden grimaces. Linda had tears in her eyes, which occasionally coursed down her cheeks. When the first piece of music came, a dance band tune by Benny Andersson's Orchestra, grief also overcame me. I hadn't known him, but I knew his children, it was their grief that touched me. Vanja sat staring intensely at her mother, she had never seen this before, and sent her a smile from time to time, as if to console her. I had told her beforehand that Mommy would cry, and it didn't matter, that was how it was at funerals, you cried and were sad, you were saying goodbye to someone who would never come back. The priest gave a thumbnail sketch of the deceased's life, Mathias read out his commemorative speech, bursting into tears at the beginning and end, otherwise his reading was loud and clear. Linda read a poem. "Bridge over Troubled Water" was played. Then Vanja started sobbing. She was inconsolable and clung to Linda. Heidi, who was sitting on my lap, patted her. In the end it became so bad that I took them out and carried them down to the sentry-box house where John was sleeping. When we entered, Vanja immediately wanted to return, she wasn't crying anymore, she wanted to lay her flowers on the coffin, as we had planned to do. I carried them back, one on each arm, put them down outside, opened the doors, and went in as the ceremony was drawing to a close and the last people were laying flowers on the coffin. Afterwards Linda said it had been so beautiful when the doors opened and we entered with the light behind us, the two small children laid their bouquets on the coffin, the final piece of music was played, everyone paused and bowed by the coffin on their way out, paying their last respects to the deceased.

At the restaurant to where we repaired after the ceremony, Linda's cousins told me how it had been when her father came to visit them in the summer, how he had filled their lives for a few days with his manic energy and lust for adventure and took them fishing or for a drive, incapable of standing still for a moment.

The next day we went with the children to the island of Djurgården. While we were at the aquarium there, Mathias came in. He told us he had been to a pub after the funeral to "get smashed out of his head," as he put it. His eyes were sensitive and kind, his voice was always cheery, he always tried to find something lighthearted to say, and as we were about to leave, he placed a friendly hand on my shoulder. He had lost his father and, sitting there, I thought, it wasn't the same father that Linda had lost because being a son or a daughter is not the same, and Linda and Mathias were so fundamentally dissimilar, also in grief, that they must have had a different experience of him.

In the afternoon we packed our things and caught the train to Arlanda Airport. We arrived three hours before the departure. But the children played and were in a good mood the whole time, even though the plane was an hour late and we didn't take off until half past nine. They fell asleep the minute we were seated on board, and when we landed in Kastrup at half past ten we had a problem: how to manage two suitcases, a backpack, a big bag, and three sleepy children? On top of which, the plane had parked at the farthermost gate, probably a fifteen-minute walk from the arrivals hall. Somehow we managed to get off the plane and into the endlessly long, empty corridor. Linda carried John and held Vanja's hand, I carried Heidi and managed the two suitcases, the backpack, and the big bag. After roughly a hundred meters Linda said she couldn't go on, it was too difficult. But you're only carrying John, I said. Surely you must be able to do that, for Christ's sake. But no, her arms hurt and she was in pain, she couldn't do it.

"Help!" she shouted in a loud voice. "Help us!"

"Shhh," I said. "You can't shout for help here, you know that."

A couple ahead of us turned and looked at us. I shook my head in an attempt to signal that it was nothing serious. If one of us had been having a heart attack I could have understood her calling for help. But just because she had her hands full? For God's sake. For God's sake.

I spotted a couple of trolleys.

I breathed a sigh of relief, placed the cases on the bottom of one, put Heidi on top, and set off without waiting for Linda. "Help." If we had got lost in the mountains or a boat had capsized at sea I might have shouted for help. But at a bloody airport?

I turned, grinned, and waited for them. The rest of the trip was fine, the children were cheery despite being tired, problems only came up at the taxi rank, Linda shouted at the poor taxi driver, who became so angry that he threw our luggage down on the road and yelled back. A kind, friendly driver came to our rescue as I was wishing the ground would swallow me up, the mortification and shame of it. He asked if we'd had a long journey, yes, said Linda, were we tired, yes, said Linda, I was in torment where I sat, watching the lights sweep across the hood as we approached Triangeln Mall in Malmö and could finally get out, take the elevator, put the children to bed, and then ourselves. The last thing I did was to put Heidi's dinosaur egg in a bowl of water. So that it would have cracked and a little dinosaur would have emerged by the time she woke the following morning.

August 27, 2011. 8:06. I am sitting in an annex on the island of Møn, in Denmark, I have to appear onstage this afternoon and tomorrow afternoon, and I drove here from Glemmingebro last night. Linda's mother is at home with us helping out, she has been there all month. After I've finished here I'll go sit in my study in Malmö and finish the novel. On Friday I am going to the literature festival in Louisiana, outside Copenhagen, with Linda. Some aspects of her life are changing. She has started to come to terms with them. She goes for a long walk every morning, she's stopped smoking, she doesn't drink alcohol anymore, not even a glass of wine with food, she eats healthily, and for more than a month she hasn't been either up in the skies or down in the dumps, but present, inside herself, as it were.

Last night I woke to her screams.

"Help," she shouted, in a loud drawn-out cry, as though danger were looming.

I was awake at once, put my arm around her, and told her it was only a bad dream. She mumbled that she knew and fell asleep again. It was half past three, I went down to the kitchen and made some coffee, went up to the loft in the other house and started writing. I had written the passage about her father's funeral straight after it happened and had promptly forgotten it. I remembered it then because she had called for help at the airport and was doing so again now. At the time I had taken it literally, she wanted help carrying John, but when I reread the passage it was impossible not to think of something else, something greater, a cry from her inner being, to me, I had to go to her rescue. I had to put everything aside, she was in distress, I had to help.

I hadn't done that, I had lost my temper and was embarrassed.

When she screamed in the night I thought I should help her. I hope I can, I hope I am good enough. I hope I have learned.

August 28, 2011. 4:56. Pitch black outside. The house where I am writing is by the sea, and the first thing I did when I woke an hour ago was listen to the faint crash of the breakers below. Last night I was woken by thunder and lightning so violent that the whole countryside was lit up by the quivering electrical discharges. Lightning flashed right outside the window, the sound of thunder came with the light – immense explosions. The rain followed, also violent, torrents fell everywhere. When I spoke to the hosts later that morning they told me water had flooded in over their kitchen floor. At just before two we drove to the venue where the performance was to take place, and at several points the road was submerged to a depth of between half a meter and a meter. The countryside around was absolutely drenched. I can't remember any thunderstorms from my youth or from later life being as intense or wild as this. When we moved to Malmö the late-summer leaden horizon could be permeated by sudden angled shafts of light and the sky would rumble and boom. Presumably the simple explanation is that atmospheric conditions are different here. Surely thunderstorms couldn't be increasing in frequency and intensity with every year that passes, could they?

Last night's performance went well. There were two hundred people in the audience and I spoke for two hours, first with the interviewer, who asked his questions, then with the audience, who asked theirs. My strategy in such situations is simple: I try to be as present as possible at the moment, by which I mean not repeat myself. I try to answer all the questions as if it were the first time they had been asked, to exercise no self-criticism at all, only to say what occurs to me on the spot. Afterwards I can't remember what I've said, and I want to be alone because, in a sense, I have been on display up there, everyone has seen me, not just for a second but for more than two hours, and I have taken great risks by not pretending. It is odd that it should be so painful, but it is. When they laugh at something I say or when there is a kind of sigh, which means that I am confirming something they have thought themselves, it hurts me because I am fooling them, that is the feeling I have, they are falling for my tricks. Linda once called me an itinerant purveyor of earnestness, and that is an apt image. Mathias, who turned up at the Culture House in Stockholm when I was there two weeks ago, told his mother afterwards that I had been fantastic and that he had never seen me so warm or sincere before. And this is exactly the point. When I am with Mathias or Linda or anyone else I am close to, I am the antithesis of warm and sincere. It is therefore as though I can only be warm and sincere in front of a group of strangers and not with kith and kin. That is why what I do is a kind of trick. When I am sitting on the stage talking to an audience there is a great distance. I can manage that and appear close and warm. When I am sitting at a table afterwards and eating with the event organizers the distance to them is not as great, but inside me I feel it is. I say nothing and seem dismissive and cold, not open or warm, as before onstage. It is as though having a name enables me to be who I actually am and how I actually feel, but only in staged settings, not in normal social situations. That is why I feel so false afterwards, even though I have really been more genuine. The smiles, the friendliness, the admiration I encounter when I sign books is unbearable, not because it isn't well meant or honest, but because it is on false premises. Deep down, I have to reject it. At the same time, when the wind changes, when my star is on the wane and I have become yesterday's news, I assume I will miss the buzz when I enter a room – all the eyes surreptitiously turning to me and the waves of applause washing over me.

Another strong feeling I had afterwards was that I had betrayed the novel by talking about it in public. It isn't public yet, it is still just mine, it is a place where I go and where I am every day, a part of me, my inner being, which, as soon as the book is published, becomes part of external reality and no longer a place where I go or am. Talking so much about it as I did yesterday doesn't feel good. The familiarity between me and the novel was broken in a way. And when I spoke about it, it sounded better, more interesting and important than it is. The Mein Kampf essay became more important when I spoke about it, in particular, it sounded good, four hundred pages about prewar Vienna, Weimar between the wars, how times and psychology, art and politics are closely linked, and the formula for all things human, I-you-we-they-it, this was easy to talk about and had an aura of significance in that context. I talked about it because they had made an effort to attend, and it didn't feel as if I could just sit there talking about myself and my life, I had to turn the occasion into something relevant for them, to create a "we," and that was what I did. To survive the moment and reap a short-term gain, I betrayed the novel. Everything is mixed as I sit here. Good and bad, false and genuine, literature and reality, private and public. As if that weren't enough, someone has sent me a copy of Weekendavisen, in which the fourth book, which has just come out here, is reviewed. I skim-read it when I came home. Bo Bjørnvig had written it. He said that for the first time in the series I hadn't been quite honest, and this was noticeable throughout the novel. A slightly false note, he said. I hadn't thought about the novel since I wrote it, but when I read that comment, it came back, and I knew that what Bjørnvig wrote was true. I had not been honest in that book. I wrote it when the pressure was at its peak, at that time the first two books were out and the debate about them was raging in the media, every single day there were several articles about them, everyone had an opinion, a newspaper like Morgenbladet ran its entire front page and several other pages inside on the immorality of what I had done and had published not only my father's name but also a photograph of a rhododendron bush he had planted and my grandparents' house. That house isn't in the novel, I located the action somewhere completely different, and their names are not in the novel either, but in this article everything became public. Other newspapers called all the characters from the novel they could track down. I spoke to Jan Vidar: as he came out of his house he had walked slap bang into two journalists who wanted to interview him about me. I spoke to Mathias: he had come home from nursery school in Stockholm with his son and was cooking when there was a ring at the door, two journalists from Norway who wanted to have a chat about me. Mathias, who wasn't even in the novel, said no, thank you, he didn't want a chat. As soon as he had shut the door he called his mother and warned her. There were journalists heading her way. And sure enough, not long afterwards there was a ring at her door. She didn't open up. They left but returned later that evening after she had gone to bed. They wouldn't give in, and she didn't dare go to the bathroom for fear that they would realize she was home and keep ringing. They called her ex-husband, Vidar, who is more than seventy years old and still lives in a house in the forest, and asked him what he thought about me and the way I had written about his former wife. They called my mother, Yngve, Tonje, and Tore, and, where I'd grown up, four of my old friends from school talked in the local paper about what I had been like and what we had done. They called all my ex-girlfriends, and my old teachers, one of them, the only man I had mentioned by name, Jan Berg, appeared on television and talked about how it felt to be described as "evil" in the hit novel of the autumn. Every single day there was something about the books in the papers, and my photo was everywhere. My entire private life had been turned upside down; there were no limits anymore: when I was at the Litteraturhus in Oslo a Dagbladet journalist ran after me and kept asking the same question, had I had sex with an underage girl? That was Book 4 he was referring to, which I was writing then, and the question, which was actually like asking me if I was a sex offender, was posed because I had mentioned a conversation with Geir about this in Book 2, and I had said Book 4 would deal with my time in northern Norway. Personally, I saw or heard nothing of what was in the papers, nothing of what was said on the radio or TV, I found out secondhand, and I heard about all the journalists who had been buzzing around everywhere. They bombarded me with e-mails at the beginning, but that stopped fairly soon, then I seemed to find myself in the eye of the storm. Verdens Gang had interviewed the people working in the Chinese takeaway beside the entrance to our apartment, I heard, and those working in the café I frequented, and the mayor of Malmö, and the owners of our apartment, whom they asked how much I paid in rent. In this climate, with all the stones of my life apparently being turned over, I sat writing about the year I had worked as a teacher in northern Norway. It was a little place where everyone knew everyone, and it had been such a sensitive situation because I went there as a teacher, and it was one thing writing about life in the family or in my closest circle and quite another writing about the children I met at school. Of course they had shown me a kind of total, unconscious trust then, although it wasn't actually shown to me but to my teacher persona, unaware that the teacher would one day write about them and their lives. Parents confided in me about their children and thus indirectly also about themselves. When I wrote the first two novels publication wasn't in my mind; usually what I wrote and thought stayed in the novel, even when I had written something outrageous – when the novel came out it was as though the outrageous passages didn't exist, as though I hadn't written them. In my debut novel I wrote about a man of twenty-six sleeping with a girl of thirteen, she was his pupil. No one took any notice. It was a risqué topic, but the novel made it innocuous. The novel sold seventy thousand copies in total, quite a large readership, but it still didn't exist, it remained with the readers. When I reached that point in the novel, it must have been the summer of 1997, I was living in a mountain farmhouse in Jølster, writing a film script with Tore. I told him what I had written and what I was thinking of writing about. I asked him for his opinion. This was a major challenge to conventional morality, I spent two weeks thinking about it, can I write about this, and if so, why am I writing about it? Tore thought I should. I came to the same conclusion, and I wrote it, uneasy and fearful, it was as though I were doing something evil. If I had been completely innocent, if this had been a theme I had plucked from the air, it wouldn't have been so bad. But then there would have been no point writing, it would have been something I had made up, a kind of thematic detail, calculated, a provocation, and therefore artistically dead. Precisely because it pained me justified my writing about it. The more painful it was, the more justified it was. It wasn't that I had slept with a thirteen-year-old pupil at that time, but I had articulated the thought, not just once but many times, and I had been filled with a desire that was strong and so secret that I managed to repress it completely as soon as I left. While I was writing the novel, it came back, I remembered, and I knew that the right thing would be to complete the thought and enact it in reality, which wasn't reality but fiction, because that is what writing a novel is, all the tendencies there are, wishes, desires, possibilities, and impossibilities crystallize in one point, an image, an act, where everything that is immanent, hidden, and veiled, reveals itself. So I did, I wrote about my alter ego, the teacher Henrik Vankel who had sex with one of his pupils, thirteen-year-old Miriam. Up to that moment I had written perhaps two hundred pages about his life in Kristiansand, much the same as my own biography, but it was only when I reached this point, the scene where they were lying together, that it became a novel and I became a novelist because there, through a simple act that never took place, I succeeded in expressing something that was true and that I had never even been able to think, on the contrary I had relegated it to the depths from which it came. This truth is the novel's truth. The novel is a place where that which cannot be thought elsewhere can be thought and where the reality we find ourselves in, which sometimes runs counter to the reality we talk about, can be manifest in images. The novel can describe the world as it is, as opposed to the world it ought to be. Everyone who has read Out of the World will understand that the emotions, urges, and desires that it contains are not something the author has made up but are something inside him. But the agreement between the author and the reader, the novel's pact, is that this conclusion should not be drawn, and if it is, only in secret. It should never be spoken aloud. The term "novel" is the guarantee of that. Only in this way can what is not said but which is true still be said. That is the pact, the author is free to say whatever he or she wants because the author knows that what he or she says will never, or at least should never, be linked with the author, with his or her private person. It is a necessary pact that the books, which provoked such a sensation and such anger, broke. I wrote them because my commitment to the novel wasn't enough for me, I wanted to go a step further and commit to reality, because the contravention of the norms that had allowed me to write a novel for the first time, when I expressed what was true through the novel, was at an end for me, it was empty, a gesture, it meant nothing or I couldn't make it mean anything, I felt that I could write anything at all. To be able to write anything at all is death for an author. An author can only write something specific, and what determines this something specific is, to be precise, commitment. My commitment was to reality, what I wrote about had really happened and it had happened as described. What the "I" of the novel felt was what the author of the novel felt, so the private space was nullified, and I personally had to answer for everything written there. Doing this was no problem in Book 1 and Book 2 because once I had broken down the barrier between my "I" and my author's "I," the barrier was down for good, and the relevant rules, that events should have happened and have been experienced in reality, were easy to follow. The books had come out to an unexpectedly warm reception from the public. And this meant that they had a life of their own and became real, beyond my control, and this was new because before I had been able to write whatever I liked, controversial or not, without it becoming real. It had always stayed in the novel. Now it didn't, it lived outside, in reality, with my photo attached, which increasingly began to resemble a logo. Nevertheless I was still able to write the third book without deviating from the categorical demand for truth because the distance from the events it portrayed, in my childhood, was so great. We, that is, the publishing house and I, still changed some names and deleted some features that might have caused offense, but not many. My mother hasn't read it yet, but she has found out quite a bit anyway; her private role as a mother has been discussed in public because of the book, as though she represented wives and mothers and as though people other than herself or her closest family were entitled to criticize what she did or didn't do. But Book 4 was different. I feared I might have started something that had got out of hand. I anonymized the village where I worked, calling it Håfjord instead of Fjordgård, as it was actually called, which the newspapers were not slow to pick up on. I gave different names to all the pupils and teachers and I also furnished them with made-up characteristics or idiosyncrasies, all to escape the commitment to reality I could no longer fulfill. In this book, therefore, I committed neither to the novel nor to reality. For this reason it became a strange book, in which I do the opposite of what an author should, I cover over the truth. In Out of the World, which deals with the same theme, I wrote the truth by committing to the novel; in the first two books I wrote the truth by committing to reality. In Book 3 this link is weaker, only to fall away entirely in Book 4. However, everything I said about myself was true. The passages that seem most authentic because they are raw are nonetheless a kind of masquerade because I knew exactly what was going on when I was there, but not when I wrote about it. And there was one thing I wrote in the book that I had never told anyone, and this was that I hadn't masturbated, not a single time, until I was nineteen. I hadn't told anyone about the ignominy and the constant humiliation of premature ejaculation either, as it is so dreadfully tritely called. One doesn't talk about that sort of thing. But what was really dangerous, the feelings I had for a thirteen-year-old girl when I was eighteen, I didn't examine in sufficient depth, the mere mention of it meant I had to be so incredibly careful with all the rest, all those fathers and mothers, sons and daughters I had mixed with while I ached with desire in an inner world that was thoroughly sexualized. The publishing house was careful too, it was not unusual for the editor, Therese, to call me to discuss whether a character was anonymous enough or whether this or that character ought not to make such and such an utterance in such and such a way. The lawyers also read the manuscript and suggested changes. The public had me and the publisher in its grip, and the novel became a hostage to reality. This is not an excuse, and this is not my way of saying Book 4 is a poor novel, it is still full of the terrible banality and vigor of youth, it is a comedy of immaturity, and despite being conventional it is inimitable, for the simple reason that it arose under precisely the conditions it did. But it is not the truth.

August 29, 2011. 2:12. I am in the flat in Malmö, which shows signs of having been empty for close on three months: all the plants have withered, the air is dry, dusty, and there is a foul smell in the bathroom; water must somehow have been left to stand in the pipes. The rest of the family is in Glemmingebro. I talked to Vanja on the phone yesterday, she said, Dad, you're not allowed to be in Malmö until Friday, you have to come tonight. I said that if she gave me permission to stay in Malmö until Friday the book I was writing would be completely finished. She said, Finished? I said, yes. Then you'll have to work all the time, she said. You shouldn't eat or sleep, just work. I'll do that, I said. But when I sat down this morning, I had such a headache and felt so lethargic I couldn't work. It has happened a couple of times over the past three years, all of a sudden I'm unable to do anything, I find it an enormous strain to get out of bed, dress, and go to the kitchen to butter a few slices of bread, almost impossible. It lasts one, maybe two days and then it goes, and everything is as before. Once it lasted a week, Linda was so worried about me that she forced me to go to the doctor, although I never go. I was given a full examination and even an ECG. Nothing. I was fit as a fiddle. I knew I was, but I went in order to reassure Linda, who, I know, is sometimes afraid I might drop dead from a heart attack. It is an interesting phenomenon, standing outside everything you used to be inside, when things you normally do without a second thought become unattainable. That is what it's like to get old, I think with fear in my heart, only slower, your strength is gradually sapped until ultimately you stand outside the life you once lived and you no longer have the strength to recover, with maybe twenty years left to live. But what is living? It is doing things and being at the center of the world. If you are deprived of that, of acting, doing, being at the center of the world, a distance develops between you and the world, you observe it but you are not part of it, and this estrangement is the start of death. Living is being greedy for days, no matter whether they are good or bad. Dying is being weary of days, when they no longer matter or cannot matter because you are no longer inside them, but on the outside. Being whisked off by an illness or a sudden accident is another thing, a different death, more brutal for those around you, but perhaps more merciful for the life that comes to an end, because it happens when life is in full spate, you are in the midst of it, and there is no slow fade. But of course I don't know. The opposite might be true, that it is best to be sated with days and watch the world slowly become weaker and weaker, lighter and lighter, until eventually it disappears and ceases to exist.

In the time it has taken to write this book four people in my close family have died. Aunty Ingunn, Uncle Magne, my great-uncle Anstein, and my father-in-law, Roland. I liked all of them, they were fine people. Now they are no more. From the more distant family further uncles and aunts have died, of whom I have no more than vague memories. Geir's mother, Signe Arnhild, has died, Christina's mother, Eivor, has died, and two of Geir's friends, Marco and Peter. The latter two were young. The others were in their midsixties to midseventies. The births: my cousin Yngvild's son, Sigurd August, whose christening Linda and I went to in January in Brussels, Linda's girlfriend's first child, Annie, and Geir and Christine's second child, Gisle. Our three children, Vanja, Heidi, and John, have gone from being four years, two years, and six months old when I started writing, to being seven and a half, almost six, and four today. The remorseless wind of time, which takes away as much as it brings, has also swept through these pages.

I am not the same person as when I started either. That is I am the same person, but my relations with other people have changed. A lot was revealed when the books, and with them my private life, were made public. Everyone I know has been put through an ordeal. It hasn't been easy for anyone. It has been hardest for Linda. Being a relative, irrespective of what emotions are involved, is both a bond and a role. Yngve is a brother, Sissel is a mother, Ingrid is a mother-in-law. Whatever Yngve did, even if he killed someone and ended up in prison, he would still be my brother and I wouldn't be able to turn my back on him. Being a father myself, I understand what it is like to be a parent and I know that what applies to your brother applies a thousand times to your children. Whatever Vanja, Heidi, or John do, I will always forgive them and I will always be there for them. Anything else is inconceivable. I thought of the aftermath of the brutal massacre on Utøya in Norway on July 22, when the father of the perpetrator said his son should have killed himself. A man with children can say that, but not a father. For parents, children, and siblings there is a guarantee, that the bond between them cannot be severed. This is so because the role is not connected with acts but with the bond. At least this has always been guaranteed for me. Mom and Yngve might be hurt or saddened by what I wrote, they might be angry with me, and they might distance themselves from me, but they would still be my mother and brother the day they, or I, die. The bond is indestructible, and of course that is for good or ill. For my father, who was so closely attached to his mother, it was also problematic because he never really freed himself to become his own man. For my mother, when I was in my teens and we lived together, the most important priority was that I should be myself and feel free. The final consequence of this is my book, which completes a trajectory that started when I was sixteen. The question then was not so much who I was as where I belonged. Now the questions have merged into one and the same. And, as when I was sixteen, it has been about freeing myself. In this book I have tried to write myself free from everything that ties, perhaps first and foremost the ties to my father, but also the ties to my mother, not the emotional ones, they are indestructible, as indeed are those to my father, but from all the values and attitudes she has transferred to me, both directly and indirectly. She has had an immense influence on me, but she doesn't any longer.

Ties of friendship are different from family ones because they are formed in the social sphere and can be dissolved there. The role of friend can be for life, but it doesn't have to be. A love relationship is close to a friendship in that it too can be formed and dissolved, but the moment love involves children it becomes a family, as you will be connected with each other via the children. You can separate, live alone, but ineluctably you still belong together through them. Another decisive difference between a friendship and a love relationship is that friendship is limited, it is an exception, which is revealed in its declaration, it refers to another place, where real life takes place. Friendship is a place of refuge from which you can observe life or where something else, set free from its surroundings, can happen. You can drink, you can play football, you can go to concerts, you can go bowling, you can talk about life. A love relationship is not a place of refuge, it is the place to be. It means that you have greater commitments, for you share the place where you reveal yourself as you are and where neither partner can get away from himself or the other person. When I met Linda and fell in love with her, everything else faded into the background, there was only her. This was an exceptional state. When it normalized and everything else returned, the spell was broken. The limitless had limits, the abnormal became the norm, the holiday became the everyday, and we, the lovers, began to argue. We had children, that too was an exceptional state, during which everything else faded, then it normalized and everything else returned, and the everyday permeated the holiday like water permeating cloth. I had written about that. When I had written about friends or acquaintances I had described only a small part of them, the part they showed me. But nothing of what I wrote was harmful or could threaten them in any way. It might have been unpleasant, but that was because they were mentioned in a novel, not because what was written was revealing or in any way damaging. It was different with my family because they played a larger role in the novel, but the only person I examined in depth was my father, and he had been dead for almost ten years. My relatives also considered the description of my grandmother offensive, but, firstly, I did not agree, and, secondly, she was dead too, and it was her descendants who would have to react to my description of her and the publication of it, which they found insulting, but in that case it wasn't them I insulted but her memory. The description of Linda was different. We lived together, she was the mother of my children, and I knew virtually everything about her. Linda and I were a "we," it was "us two." But the "we" was not all of me, it was what I shared with her, and in all relationships you hold that which you don't share outside, that which belongs only to the "I." The moment you bring it in, it belongs to both of you. I hadn't written about our relationship but about my life within it, and in so doing brought it into the relationship, for now she had to consider my secret thoughts as joint, now we had those in common as well. They weren't secret in any criminal or underhanded way, they were secret in the sense that I didn't reveal them because they weren't relevant to what we shared. They might perhaps have had a negative effect on it. Everyone has such thoughts and everyone knows everyone has them, but in a tacit agreement they are not mentioned and constitute no part of what two people have together. The urge to crane your neck after a beautiful woman in the street, the urge to be alone, an indifference to the people your partner likes or is close to, everything that is done out of duty and not for pleasure. Beyond this, I also presented an image of her that she didn't know. She suspected it, she may even have known, but in what we shared it was not mentioned and it was therefore nonexistent, it was more like something vaguely threatening but unformed, I imagined. However, not only that, others would also read about it and form their own image of Linda as a result. They didn't know her, and that didn't matter, but the very knowledge that this is the image others would get from me would have to be integrated into her identity. Not only the new "This is how I am for Karl Ove when he is alone" but also "Now others can see this is how Karl Ove sees me," and the power of this was immense, especially for Linda, I knew, who was the kind of person who had dreams and could partly live in those dreams. The dream of love, the dream of family, the dream of a professional career, the dream of a role as writer. In the book love was pervaded with frustration, family life was a series of duties, and she was a character I criticized for not doing enough and burdening me with her limitations. I had asked her to read this and approve it.

How could I have done that?

The truth was that when I sat down to write the novel I had nothing to lose. That was why I wrote it. I wasn't only frustrated, the way you can become when you live as a parent with small children and have many duties and have to sacrifice yourself, I was unhappy, as unhappy as I have ever been, and I was all alone. My life was pretty dreadful, that was how I experienced it, I was living a dreadful life, and I wasn't strong enough, I didn't have the spine to abandon this and start anew. I often thought about leaving, sometimes several times a day, but I couldn't do it, it was no good, I couldn't bear the thought of the consequences for Linda and her life, because if there was one thing she was afraid of it was this: that I might leave her or I might die. I was also afraid of her anger. And I was afraid of her mother's anger. The terrible reproaches I would have to confront, the treachery I had inflicted on Linda and our children, I couldn't face that. But that was what made me decide to write a novel in which I threw caution totally to the winds and told it as it was. Only when the book was ready to be published did I realize what I had done and went through the manuscript and crossed out the worst. Not about Linda, but about the people around her. And then I added our love story, for that was what had brought me to where I was. How could two people who so clearly had such love for each other, whose hearts burned with love, end up in such darkness, in such misery? It wasn't the everyday grind that had darkened our existence, far from it. I didn't mind changing diapers, dressing and undressing the children, taking them to school, walking in the park and playing, cooking, doing the dishes and the laundry. What I couldn't cope with was doing all this and writing at the same time – and encountering nothing but criticism, always hearing that I didn't do enough, and whenever I wanted to do something else not being able to because she couldn't be on her own with the children. She offended my mother, she offended my brother, and she offended my close friends, and she could be so unpleasant that I was torn apart with conflicts of loyalty. But what made the whole thing so crazy was that her mental picture of what was happening was the exact opposite of reality, and that was the picture we lived by. In it she was the hub of the family, the person who drove everything and sacrificed herself. Even when I was in the bathroom scrubbing and cleaning, and she stood watching, she couldn't refrain from letting drop a critical comment, I was too fussy, at that rate I would never finish, and although she never did any cleaning, apparently she was the one who kept the apartment in order. Even when I had to take the children in two strollers to school, as well as John, because she was tired and wanted to sleep a bit more, and even though only three days before I had broken my collarbone, she was the one who wore herself out doing everything with the children. She often stayed in bed, and could lie there for days on end, she constantly had pains somewhere, either in her throat or her stomach or her head, it was always the same, she was ill, and then she couldn't do anything, on those days I had to do everything. As for me, I was rarely ill. And if I was, she refused to acknowledge it. Once, when I had a temperature of one hundred and four, she said I took to my bed for no reason, typical man, if she had the tiny ailment I had now, no problem, she would soldier on. I stared at her, mouth agape. What insanity was this? Were we living in Upside-Down Land? Me, who was never ill, whereas she, who had such a low threshold for anything disagreeable, never took to her bed for anything – was so egregious that I was speechless. Furious, I staggered to the nursery school with Vanja, hardly able to stand upright, we lived in Stockholm then, and for the rest of the day I lay delirious in my office. If anything went wrong at home, something as trivial as a lightbulb going, it would never be repaired or changed unless I did it. I could clean the whole apartment one Saturday morning and have the children at the same time, but if she had the children and I cleaned, she complained there was so much on her shoulders and so little on mine. I did all the food shopping, trudged home with all three children, and four or five shopping bags filled to the brim, I had to get everything in one trip to save time so I could write, and it was like that with everything, I didn't have a minute free because once the apartment and the children had been taken care of I had to write, apart from five minutes on the balcony, sitting alone smoking, for which she also berated me, she never had any breaks like that. It was as though she regarded the time I wrote as my own, leisure, something for me, and after I had finished and went out, I had to continue to do all sorts of things, for now she wanted her downtime. She didn't write when she could have, so it wasn't that, she didn't have a job either, and although she talked about it, she didn't do anything specific. I had no problem with that, for when she did write she wrote something essential and brilliant, and that was enough for me. The problem was that she had an image of herself as someone who was always working and constantly exhausted as a result, while I was someone who thought only of myself and never did anything. It was crazy, absolutely crazy, because I couldn't correct this picture if I tried, she just said I didn't "see" her and all she did, and that was typical of men, women did everything, but invisibly while what men did was visible. It was impossible to fight against this. Of course I saw what she did with the children, but I did exactly the same, plus all the other stuff. She also reproached me for not loving her enough and said I was selfish and prioritized writing above family life. I wrote perhaps for five hours a day while the children were at school, and I didn't write on weekends, which was strictly forbidden, so in reality I worked minimally at what brought in the cash and maximally at everything else. This situation lasted for many years. I couldn't stand it, but I had to if I wanted to keep everything in one piece. Occasionally I reached the breaking point. The first time I told her I didn't want to keep this up and I was going to leave her was the summer we moved to Malmö. We had been living for a few weeks with Linda's mother and her husband, in the mornings I went into town and worked on the Bible translation, returning in the afternoon while Linda was with her mother and Vanja and Heidi. One evening I didn't go back, I went out with Geir, that was fine with Linda, we went to the Södra Theater, the outdoor terrace there, and I got so drunk I couldn't stand up to walk to the train I had said I would catch. When I arrived back at two in the morning she was furious with me and shouted. I became so desperate that I started crying. I yelled that I couldn't take any more. I can't take any more, Linda, I said. I simply can't do this. I've had enough. I'm leaving. And I'm leaving now. After I had said that I marched into our room, threw my clothes in a suitcase, shut it, carried it outside, and set off down the forest path as Linda screamed for me not to go, I couldn't leave her, please don't go, don't go. Her tearstained face and her vow that she would change made it impossible for me to continue. I stopped, walked back, put down the suitcase, and stayed. When we were moving, only a few days later, while Linda was at Helena's, I worked nonstop for thirty-two hours packing everything we owned into cardboard boxes and finished half an hour before the moving van arrived. Then we all went by train to Malmö.

This autumn was the best we'd had since we first got together. It was the new town, the new apartment, the open sky and beautiful late-summer weather that did it, but perhaps it was also because the depths of my despair had revealed themselves to her, because our relationship opened as well, there was more room to maneuver, and once the first six months were over it became clear we were expecting another child, and the good times rolled on until they didn't, presumably they had been too much for both of us, and we were back where we had been. We argued and shouted, that was her way of solving disagreements, which I had to face, while mine was distance, the most frightening of all for her, and so the spiral wound downward again. I became unloving, dismissive, did what I had to do out of duty, took my frustration out on her, was ironic, sarcastic until she'd had enough and met it with a furious outburst, which was the most frightening response of all for me. It wasn't always like this, there were good days too, and whenever we had guests or visited someone we found each other again, then it was "us two," and the darkness that shrouded what we actually were, which was no small thing, namely soul twins, lifted. We also had children, whom we obviously both loved above all else, and we were almost of one mind with regard to who they were, what qualities they had and showed; we saw the same, thought the same, and felt the same. But the disharmony between us spilled over them too, of course, because we weren't above arguing in front of them, and when I was at my angriest with Linda but swallowed my anger and didn't want to talk, it was the children I took it out on. If Linda had stretched out on the sofa and said I should take them for a walk because they needed some fresh air, they didn't have to put up much resistance before I was shouting, almost frothing with rage, or shaking them. Once Linda and I had been yelling at each other in the kitchen, the children appeared in the doorway, in descending order of height, we saw them and quieted down. Then Vanja came in and reenacted what had happened, Dad shouted and banged the table, there, Mommy shouted and threw a cup on the floor, there. Linda and I looked at each other, her face was ashen, we both realized what we were doing. The situation could not continue like this, but it did. The only reason I could write about it was that I had reached a point where I no longer had anything to lose. It made no difference if Linda read this, she could do what she liked. If she wanted to leave me, she could. I didn't give a damn. I woke up unhappy, spent the day unhappy, and went to bed unhappy. If only

I could have an hour, a day, a week, a month, a year alone, everything would be fine, I knew that. That is for me, not for her. For Linda it wouldn't be good, I knew that too. The very thought of leaving filled me with guilt and a bad conscience, in my mind I was living a double life. I was also afraid of facing all the fury and the abyss-opening fear which my departure would create. Linda was frightened, that was the point, she was afraid, whereas I was so conflict-averse that I would rather live in despair than say how things were. And as soon as the tide turned, and we were fine again, I thought, I love her, and perhaps it was difficult just now, but it would pass. When Linda's father died I was so emotionally blunted to everything that I couldn't give her any of what she needed. I was giving everything to the novel and the children, I was giving nothing to her.

Then there was a change, something out there turned against me and went on the attack. It was as though everything inside me was in jeopardy, as though the ground beneath my feet had gone. There was something out there, and to confront it I sought courage in what I had within, my real life, Linda, Vanja, Heidi, and John, and found strength there. I knew what I had. I knew what they meant to me. I saw Linda, who she was, and I saw our children. I saw my family. I didn't want to lose it. I didn't want to lose Linda. She was everything I had. And she kept me alive. If I turned away from life, if I wanted to retreat and disappear from the world, she tugged at me, I wasn't allowed to, I had to be there for her, in the midst of life. I needed her, and I needed the children, they made me a whole person. And she needed me, and the children needed me.

Such was the situation when, some days after we had returned from Prague, this topsy-turvy autumn, I gave Linda the manuscript. When I wrote it I'd had nothing to lose, when she read it now, suddenly I had everything to lose.

She was going to Stockholm to see a theater performance, up by train one morning, back the next day. The previous night I sat wondering whether to remove the passages that would hurt her most, it would be easy to do and wouldn't detract from the novel, but at the same time I thought it had to be truthful, if not it was utterly meaningless, all of it. I wanted to show her this because it was true. That the truth was not just in a letter to her, meant for her eyes only, but in a novel, meant for everyone's eyes, made what I was asking her to do actually inhuman. Fear and guilt accumulated in my chest like water behind a dam. I tried to subdue them by telling Linda there were a lot of terrible parts in the novel and she would be angry, but my intentions were not bad. She just smiled, she could take it, she said, don't worry. She put the manuscript in her bag, stood up straight by the open front door, we gave each other a kiss, again she told me not to worry and said everything would be fine, then she stepped into the corridor, closed the door behind her, and was gone. I went to the balcony and had a smoke, walked back to my study and worked on Book 3, strolled down to the kiosk and bought some more cigarettes, returned to my study and wrote a little more, but the thought of Linda reading the manuscript was burning inside me, there was no room for anything else, and the most difficult aspect of it all was that she was reading without any explanations, without any corrections, I had to soften the blow and dialed her number. It had been an hour since she left. She answered at once. I could hear from her voice that she was sad. She said she was on the train and had started reading. She thought it was good, terrible to read, but she was coping. I told her I had been frustrated, but I wasn't now. She said, Goodbye, romanticism. She said, One thing's for sure – all the illusions about our relationship have gone now. Her voice was unemotional as she spoke, and there was something hard there, as though she had told herself to resist. I'm sorry, Linda, I said. I'm sorry too, she replied. But it won't get any worse than this, will it? she asked. Yes, I said. It will. I'll survive that too, she said. OK, I said. But now I'm hanging up, she said. OK, I said. Talk to you later.

I ate, wrote, sat on the balcony smoking, washed some clothes, wrote a bit more, and then I couldn't wait any longer, I called her. She had cried, she said, but now the train was close to Stockholm and she was looking forward to meeting Helena and maybe thinking about something else for a few hours. We clicked off, I picked up the children, made them some food, they watched children's TV, I brushed their teeth, put on their pajamas and read to them, then went to bed not long after they had fallen asleep. I took them to school, wrote, talked to Linda on the phone, she was on the train home, she had just read my description of how we first got together and her voice sounded lighter. I told her the worst was still to come and she should brace herself. She didn't believe me, I could hear, there was a smile in her voice when she said she would.

An hour later she called.

"What happened on Gotland?" she shouted.

"Only what's written," I said.

"What did you do?"

"It's all in the manuscript. I knocked on the door."

"Who was she? Why did you do it?"

"I was drunk."

"When was it? I remember when it was. I was at home with the children. Heidi was sick. How could you do that? How could you? Who was she?"

"That doesn't make any difference."

"Why didn't you tell me?"

"You know why."

"How can you write that in a novel and let me read about it?"

"I don't know. It just happened like that."

"Well, I don't want to talk to you anymore."

She hung up. A few minutes later she called again.

"Who was she? I want to know who she was."

"I don't know what her name is, Linda. Nothing happened."

"You were banging on her door all night."

"Yes, I'm sorry. But that's how it was."

"Heidi was sick. I was all alone."

"Yes," I said.

She hung up. I went onto the balcony, smoked, trudged back inside, paced back and forth in the apartment, phone in hand the whole time. Surfed the Net, went back out and smoked, stood in front of the living-room window and gazed across at the hotel, went back into the study and surfed, out again and smoked, shuffled from room to room, finally stopped in the children's bedroom, the innocence there would do me good, I thought, but it didn't, everything just got worse and I went back out on the balcony. I didn't have a thought in my head, not one.

She called again just as I was going to pick up the children. She was calmer. She had read the manuscript now, she said. What shall we do? she said. She began to cry as she said that. What shall we do now, Karl Ove? And suddenly I snapped. I sobbed. I said, I don't know. I cried. I said, I don't know, Linda. I don't know.

An hour later I was in the kitchen frying fish cakes when I heard the sound of the elevator outside, it seemed to come all the way up and I called to the children to go and see if it was Mommy. They didn't need to be asked twice, they had missed her, as they always did when she was away, and now they were in the hall waiting for the door to open. They pressed against her, she knelt down and hugged them in turn, stroking their backs as she sent me an all-penetrating look. She was red-eyed and pale, but still full of warmth when she turned to the children. They didn't notice the glare she had sent me.

Look what you've done, it said.

Look what we've got and you're destroying, it said.

The children clung to her as she took off her shoes and jacket and put the little suitcase by the wall. I set the table, we ate, we said nothing to each other, conversation plied back and forth between us and the children. They were excited and happy to have her back. Afterwards we sat in the living room to watch children's TV with them. After a while she looked at me and said, in English:

"The knife."

I didn't understand what she meant. She occasionally spoke English to me when she didn't want the children to understand, which I was unable to do and didn't like. That wasn't what I was thinking about at this moment, of course, only about her pasty face and red eyes, which in some way had something to do with a knife.

"In the novel," she said. "The knife."

"What are you talking about, Mommy?" Vanja asked.

"I'm just chatting with Daddy," she said. "About something he wrote."

A knife? What kind of knife? Had I written about a knife?

"What do you mean?" I said.

"The one Geir gave you," she said. "No one will understand why it's in the book if it isn't used. A pistol mentioned in the first act is fired in the fifth."

Geir? I puzzled. What did he and his present have to do with this?

"What pistol?" Vanja said.

"We're talking about a play. Drama," I explained.

"Quite a drama," Linda said.

When the TV program was over she read to the children. I sat on the balcony, my soul chilled. We would have to clear the air once the children were asleep. I had sensed her restrained anger and despair the whole time. She would give vent to them when the children were asleep.

I couldn't stay on the balcony. I didn't want her to come out thinking I was relaxing and didn't care. So I got up and returned to the living room, sat down on the sofa, heard her say goodnight to the children, their protests, she mustn't go yet, they weren't tired, they couldn't sleep. A banging noise reverberated through the apartment, it was Vanja lying on her back in bed and hitting her heels against the wall.

She went into the kitchen. Poured some water, opened a cupboard, I knew she was making tea. Just afterwards came the roar of the kettle. Then she came in with a big cup in one hand and sat down on the sofa, on the other side of the table from me. She looked straight at me. I felt sick.

"What did you mean about the knife?" I asked.

"He gave it to you so you could stab me. He wanted to get rid of me. Don't you understand? He's a vampire. He hasn't got a life of his own. He lives through you. Do you think him giving you a knife was chance?"

"It was his prized possession," I said.

She snorted.

"This isn't about Geir," I said. "This is about you and me."

"With him looking over your shoulder," she said.

"No," I said. "He's the only person I can go to outside the family. It's the same for me as it is for you and Helena."

"We don't speak like you do. I say only nice things about you to Helena. I've never said anything else."

I didn't answer. I looked down at the floor. She lifted the cup to her mouth and drank. Looking straight at me.

There was one thing I had to ask her. Something she hadn't mentioned.

"What happens if I publish it?" I said.

"Do so by all means. It's a good book. I can see that. If it hadn't been, all this would've been impossible."

"Is there anything you want me to take out?"

"No. I mean, yes. One thing. The part where you write that Bergman patted me on the head and said I was a beautiful child. That's so incredibly embarrassing you'll have to take it out."

"Nothing else."

"There were some mistakes and misunderstandings. But we can look at them later. Otherwise nothing."

She put down the cup and looked over at the balcony door. It had got darker outside.

"Who was she?" she asked.

"Who?" I said, even though I knew very well whom she meant.

"On Gotland. What was her name? What did she look like?"

"Don't go there," I said. "No good will come of it. I don't know what her name was. I was drunk. I was out of control."

"And then you did it? While I was here with Vanja and Heidi, and Heidi was ill. I trusted you."

"I know," I said. "I'm sorry."

Again she glanced at the door. Then she jumped up. Her eyes were either furious or frightened or both.

"I can't stay here. I can't be here with you. It's awful. I'm off to Jenny's. You take the children tomorrow."

"OK," I said.

"I can't believe you did it," she said, and ran into the hall as fast as she could, threw on her jacket, bent down and put on her shoes. Her hands were trembling as she tied the laces, she couldn't tie them quickly enough.

"I'll call you," she said.

And then she was gone.

Jenny was a costume and set designer. She had children in the same nursery school as we did, that was where we had met her, and then she and Linda had become friends. She lived in a house with a big garden outside the center, which she had bought with a girlfriend, and Linda had a permanent offer to write there if she wanted. Sometimes she did. Sometimes, when she needed to get away, she slept over as well. So when, the following morning, the children asked where Mommy was there was nothing strange about my answer, she had left early to go to Jenny's. We were late leaving for school, it was one of those mornings when everything was difficult, and just as we were finally outside and about to cross the street, Linda came walking toward us on the other side from a gaggle of people waiting for the bus. She looked drained and exhausted. She still hadn't seen us, and when she did, as the lights changed to green and we stepped off the sidewalk, it seemed to come as a shock. It was as if she were seeing ghosts. The children caught sight of her, Vanja and Heidi let go of the stroller and raced over, John stretched out his arms.

"I thought you were at school," she said without looking at me. "I hadn't expected to run into you here."

"Where've you been, Mommy?" Vanja said. "Were you at Jenny's?"

She nodded.

"I just had to run home to pick something up."

She stood up and looked at me for the first time.

"Will you be there when I get back?" I asked.

She shook her head.

"Can I call you then?"

"I'll call later," she said.

"OK," I said. "See you."

"See you," she said, and we set off in different directions, me with the children toward school, her toward the apartment.

She came back in the evening, after the children had gone to bed. I made us some tea, we sat in the living room. Even though the despair was still present it wasn't as close to the surface as it had been. My insides were as chilled as they had been at other times in my life when I'd found myself in crises, when it is as though everything around me is burning with white heat and the only other thing left is feelings, which are completely out of control. Being in a crisis is being at the center because when everything is on the line, everything is vital. That is all that exists. This was that sort of crisis. Everything else had fallen by the wayside, there was only this, her and me.

I didn't know what to say. We drank our tea in silence. We looked at each other, we looked down.

"How are you?" I said.

"Better," she said.

"We should talk," I said.

"Yes, we must," she said.

"We must talk seriously. No pretense."

She nodded.

"I've had a terrible time," I said.

"I know," she said.

"I'm sorry you had to read about it in a novel. But the novel's not the point for me. It's life. That's what we should talk about. We can't be like this. It's impossible. We can't."

"No," she said. "I know."

"Not just for the children's sake. But for ours too. We're as far away from where we were when we got together as it's possible to be. Do you remember what it was like then? Do you remember how fantastic it was?"

"Of course I do. I long for it too."

"But we're in a different place now. You say 'goodbye, romanticism.' But this isn't about romanticism. It's about this life. It's all we have. And we have to try to make it good. As good as possible."

I got up and sat next to her. Put my arms around her. She cried. She cried and cried. I cried too. We went to the balcony and sat down in the darkness, she lit a cigarette, so she had started smoking again, I lit up too. We went into the bedroom. We stayed there the whole night, in the dim light from the hall lamp. I sat with my back to the wall looking ahead in the gloom, she lay beside me. We talked about everything there was to talk about. We were completely honest. It was as though everything we had established between us, all the images, ideas, dreams, desires, and hopes had crashed, and all that was left was the core, which we talked about. Her and me. Who we were to each other. It was like when we lay in bed in the little Stockholm apartment in Bastugatan and talked and listened to music and were completely open, completely naked, completely honest, because there was nothing to hide, not only did we have each other, we wanted each other. I wanted her, she wanted me. We could never return to that, we were somewhere else now, but it was perhaps a better place, it had a deeper feel to it because we had our children, we were a family, it was real, it was us, we didn't need any dream between us and life. She had to accept me as I was. She had to leave me in peace. She had to trust that I too wanted the best for everyone. And I had to support her because she couldn't carry on as she was, she had lost herself, slipped into a darkness where she no longer knew what was up and what was down, what was children, what was her, what was me.

At last I was calm. What had happened, had happened. There were no dangers. I hadn't felt like this since we first got together. It was like that then. There had been no tensions and we had been utterly free. Everything had been open. Now we had done what we'd planned with such passion. We had started a family, we had children, and it was unbelievable that it had been that which would cleave me to her, and her to me. But that's what had happened.

We stayed there talking all night and when morning came she went back to Jenny's. She had more to ponder alone. At twelve she called and said she'd sent me an e-mail. I walked down to the Internet café because our connection still wasn't working and read it there, in the dark between all the bright screens and the shouts from the war-game players.

Darling Karl Ove. I feel this is the only thing I can say. It is as though someone has died. Was it me? Have I died? The person I was.

You have told me so often to live my own life.

I know you are right. I'm so frightened.

You know how frightened I am.

You say you don't want to be everything for me. I sense a way to go and I'm afraid. I'm standing at the bottom and know that I have to start living.

I know nothing about this life.

I see myself with the children. I see myself cycling in the wind. I see myself abandoning things before I need to. I see the two of us in the evenings. I have to let you out of my sight and do something I want to do. I don't know what I want. I don't know what is good for me. I know that I have to make something of myself.

I want to take photos of the children. The mess in the apartment. I want to do something with the children.

You say we have to accept each other completely. I know this is right. Deep inside me I hear a clear voice. I want to quietly mourn the child I was. I want to be an adult now. What is the endless grief that pours forth when I see you breaking down this door?

I love you. I will love you till eternity. And I know that it's hard to bear all this love and all this yearning. I would like to be able to love you in a way that is good for us. I know I must let go. I am letting go, Karl Ove. I love you so much. You and the children are a miracle that has happened to me.

When she came back that afternoon and we cooked and ate as usual it felt as if we had lived through a year in the past two days. I was utterly exhausted, she was too, but at the same time something trembled inside me, and I knew that feeling, it was happiness. Whenever I felt myself tremble like this I tried to repress it, for if there is one thing I had learned in the forty years I'd been alive it was that it was so much easier to carry despair than hope.

The whole of autumn 2009 and spring 2010 were like this, for if the two days had felt like a year, the year had felt like ten. I had three novels published that fall, and two the following spring. All of them had to be edited and marketed, three of them also had to be written, at the same time I couldn't let Linda carry the whole burden at home, so the solution was to write fast, I set a quota of ten pages every day, and if, an hour before I was due to pick up the children, I had done six, I had to write four in that hour and then go and get them. It worked fine, I liked the feeling that something new was happening all the time and never knew where what I was writing would end. The pressure to write so much made it possible, and although I didn't like what I wrote, I liked the situation, everything was open and there wasn't a gatekeeper in sight. The media pressure, which grew with every day that passed, was more difficult to manage for me, but by completely ignoring it, by instructing everyone I spoke with not to mention a word to me of what was in the newspapers, not so much as a hint, the problem solved itself. If they did despite my instructions, it was utter torture for me, such as the time I saw that my old teacher had commented on the book he was in. I read in Weekendavisen that he had appeared in their quotations column. The media furor had just started when we returned from our brief trip to Prague. The first novel, which had just been reviewed in the literature pages, was now being discussed in other sections, and while reviewers had read it as a novel with material from reality and had not made anything of the fact that the people I wrote about were not only characters in a novel but also existed in reality, the potential consequences of this dimension soon began to dawn on journalists, especially as this perspective had been so dominant in Bergens Tidende's coverage. They had interviewed my uncle about the book and also censured it in an editorial written by Jan H. Landro. On Tuesday I called Geir Gulliksen, and at the end of the conversation he said he was about to debate my book with Landro in the culture program on NRK radio. I called him afterwards to ask how it had gone. He said it had been fine but a bizarre experience. Landro hadn't quoted any concrete examples from the book to show what was wrong with it, apart from one, which did have some emotional force because it hurt someone, but ethically and legally it was insignificant. Somewhere in the book he said I had written that as a twenty-year-old I'd had a girlfriend I didn't really love. How might she be feeling when she reads that, Landro had said, according to what Geir told me. But she's anonymous, isn't she, Geir had said. Her name isn't even mentioned! If a writer can't write about a woman he went out with twenty years before and can't say he didn't really love her, if he does it anonymously, not mentioning any names, what would happen to Norwegian literature then? It would disintegrate, wouldn't it. That was more or less what Geir told me he had said. But why on earth didn't Landro say anything about the family? I thought that was the whole point. They'd interviewed your uncle and, based on his reaction, they condemn what you've done.

I think I know why, I said to Geir. Tell me then, Geir said. I received a copy of an e-mail today, I said. Gunnar sent it to Bergens Tidende at two o'clock to thank them for the way they'd covered the case. I'm fairly sure Landro read it before he met you. I can't see any other explanation. So far they've communicated with Gunnar on the phone. Berdahl too. And on the phone Gunnar is sensible and clear. But when he writes he seems to lose all proportion. Landro must've suddenly realized who he's been defending. Actually, he can't do that because Gunnar will unpack his whole theory about my mother's family to them.

Really? Geir said.

So they chose principles instead, I said. But I'll pass on the e-mail. He's only sent copies to my mother, Yngve, and me this time, and to Tønder and Landro, but not the publishing house.

Send it to me, Karl Ove, Geir said. We'll talk later.

Linda's mother, came down to help us that fall, we had so much going on, and Ingrid's own mother had always gone to help her when her life was busy, she looked after Linda and Mathias, cooked, and kept the house clean. Ingrid took after her mother in this. She got up early and made pancakes for the children, they were so thin, she thought, or baked bread rolls for them, she brushed their hair, helped to dress them, and when they had gone to school with Linda, she went out to get the items she needed for what she'd be cooking that day. She prided herself on the food she made, and we were spoiled; everything was made from scratch with fresh produce from the big market in Möllevangen and the plethora of immigrant shops along the streets there. She made lunch, and when I picked up the children, dinner was ready and waiting for us. She was invaluable. Yet I had described in great detail the conflict-filled relationship I had with her in Book 2. She had received the manuscript close to the deadline, and had been obliged to read it quickly and give feedback in a couple of days. She thought it was a great novel. She said, Lars Norén, eat your heart out. But she was also annoyed with what I had written about her, I noticed that when she was at our place, the constant ambivalence toward me. One of the first days she came over to me and said, That's not me you've described in the book. You should know that. It's a character bearing my name in a novel. But you can have it as a present from me.

I traveled to Stavanger to do a reading at Café Sting with, among others, Tore, who picked me up from the hotel in his Toyota and drove me to his apartment. He'd got divorced and was now on his own. The walls were covered with books and records. Darkness was falling outside. I had a beer in my hand, some group Tore was into and I had never heard of was on the stereo. We tried on clothes. This shirt, Tore, or that one? Take that one. This jacket or that one? Take that one. Him standing in front of an ironing board in the kitchen, me in front of the mirror. And from all this, unless it was just me, arose a strong, distinct sense of going out in the early nineties, student life. It hadn't been magical then, it was what it was, neither "student days" nor "being young" nor "freedom" but something else. Everyday life. In the midst of it Tore and I read Proust, spellbound by the mythical world he described, and we discussed the very attraction of those things that had not existed during those times. Now our decade, which had meant nothing at all to us, had itself become something, and occasionally – now, for example – exerted an immense appeal.

Tore was thirty-six, I was forty. We were adults, but we behaved like teenagers, drank beer, played pop music, joked. He had two children, I had three. We had both become the only thing we wanted to be: novelists. That thought could still gladden my heart. Once we had put an advertisement in Dagbladet, this was during the Christmas period toward the end of the nineties. It said, The New Sentimentalists wish the Norwegian nation a merry Christmas and a very happy New Year.

"Do you remember the ad we put in the paper?" I said, sitting in a chair and smoking while he was trying on a freshly ironed shirt in the hall.

"Which ad?" he said.

I told him.

He laughed.

"Oh, yes, Jesus. That's true."

"Perhaps there's someone out there somewhere still trying to figure out what it meant," I said.

"Yes, it didn't exactly become a national movement, did it."

"Your division of books you cry over and books you don't is definitely up there too," I said.

"Tie or bow tie or nothing?" he said.

"Nothing," I said.

He put on a plaid jacket and a cloth cap.

"Shall we go then?"

I nodded, rose to my feet, and then we took a taxi to the café, where Frode Grytten had already arrived. He introduced us to his brother, who was a meteorologist or something else equally distant from cultural life. Tore and Frode had become friends. He had shown Tore respect, not all writers did, so I liked him for that reason alone.

People stared at me. As they had done at the airport. A girl came over to me outside, where I was smoking, she could hardly articulate what she wanted to say, something about me had intimidated her.

We did our readings, and afterwards we went to Cementen and drank beer, Tore told me a terrible story about his life, it was grim and shocking, an abyss. There were such abysses in his life, but they were not apparent in his manner, the way he behaved, what he talked about, yet they defined him, at least to my mind, he was someone who believed he would sink into the ground if he stood still, so he didn't.

On the plane I reflected that I had given away all of myself, I had nothing left of my own, I was a no one. Perhaps it was because I had been drinking the night before that I had these thoughts, although I hadn't drunk much, but it was enough for me to feel angst, maybe because there had been so many people looking at me, and as a result I understood what I had actually done, everyone could read everything about me, even total strangers, and think what they liked. I had put Vanja, Heidi, and John in their hands.

I met Tore again not so long afterwards, at a literature festival in Odda. I flew to Bergen, rented a car to drive along the fjord, appeared onstage with Tore, drove back to the airport the next day, and flew home. The festival organizer was Marit Eikemo, we had worked with her on Student Radio. Yngve and Asbjørn came to watch; Selma Lønning Aarø, whom I remembered from student days when she won a novel-writing competition, was there; and Pedro Carmona-Alvarez, I knew who he was, he played in Sister Sonny, sometimes wore makeup when he went out, I had never spoken to him, but I'd written about him in the summer, that is, about his latest novel, Rust, which had impressed me, he was there, and we sat drinking in the hotel bar, all of us, and there too I had the feeling that the nineties weren't over, they just kept going and going. At the actual performance Tore produced many old letters and e-mails I had sent him during that period, there was also one about my father, which he read out while we were all sitting onstage, and at first I was unable to comment on it because I couldn't remember ever having written it.

> My father died two weeks ago. He passed away in an armchair in the house where he grew up, it is hard to believe, I can't believe it, and now I'm over it, now I'm here in Bergen and I'm writing to you, Tore, my friend, in Iceland. Yngve called to say what had happened, I caught the next plane down to his, and together we drove to Kristiansand the day after. I cried every day for a week. I had often wondered: what if he dies – but I had never imagined this is how I would react. So what was I grieving over? I don't know. It has nothing to do with rationality, it was just feelings, they kept gushing up, I lay alone in my grandmother's house, in tears. Now I'm over it again, now it's as if it hasn't happened.

I was moved as I sat there because the voice came from August 20, 1998, and because it was still stricken with grief, perhaps without even knowing. It was there, onstage, that I really understood for the first time what it meant that Dad was dead. It was as though it was only then, in Odda, that he died for me. That was why the whole world suddenly became so incomprehensible.

The next morning I met the editor in chief at Spartacus, Frode Molven, in the hotel café. I'd sent him Geir's book, which after six years' toil was finally finished. It was called Baghdad Indigo and was a unique piece of work. It was about the human shields who had traveled to Baghdad to stop the U.S. invasion by occupying the most important bombing targets. Geir went with them, all the way from Istanbul to Baghdad, on board a red double-decker bus, and he was a human shield in Baghdad throughout the invasion. He interviewed all sorts of people in the war zone, even when the sky above them was exploding and the windows behind them were being blown out. What was war, and why was it so appealing to so many, even to those who had gone there to stop it? That formed the core of the book. Unlike the journalists, who were looked after by the regime and were either bussed around town or sat in their hotel rooms, Geir was free to go wherever and whenever he wanted. When Baghdad fell and elite U.S. soldiers were standing by the waterworks where he and a handful of other activists were staying he grabbed his backpack and lived with them for a few weeks. He interviewed them; they had come straight from the fighting and were more than happy to talk. The book was more than eleven hundred pages long, and that meant the three months it spanned had enormous importance, like something beyond time. He had captured a fragment of time. Practically no one did this anymore; journalists' reports and books from the war zone were light, noncommittal, the authors had moved on even before the corpses had gone cold. The specifics of time and place disappear in their unspecific, similar voices; conflicts merge into one, regardless of whether they take place in Afghanistan, Libya, or Somalia. When I read Geir's book it was like reading something from the Spanish Civil War in the thirties, not because the conflict was similar, but because the approach was the same as in many books from that period, namely existential. Baghdad Indigo was an excellent book, of that I had no doubt, so I had told Geir it would be easy to get it published. He was skeptical, he didn't want to take anything for granted, and didn't listen to me. I thought it best to send the manuscript to a publishing house before it was finished, so that they could be involved earlier in the process, it was such unusually comprehensive material. Geir listened to me, and I sent it to Aslak Nore, the nonfiction editor at Gyldendal. He had read Geir's previous book, he said in his e-mail back to me, he liked it, was interested in the topic, and was looking forward to reading the latest. He also wanted to ask me a little favor while I was there, would I mind writing a blurb for the book? Just a couple of words. Of course I couldn't say no as his decision regarding Geir's book was so important. I wrote a recommendation, however Nore not only rejected Geir's book but also went on the attack with a vengeance, calling it immoral. The second person I sent the manuscript to was Halvor Fosli at Aschehoug, but he was halfhearted, lukewarm, he never read the book, which became apparent when he said it was anti-American, which it was not, he had only skimmed it, he must have read a few lines of the interviews with the peace activists and assumed they reflected the book's main thrust. Fosli said he would talk about the book at a meeting with the other editors, which of course produced nothing. So Geir gave up on this strategy and decided to wait until the manuscript was completely finished. Which it was now. I couldn't imagine that anyone would say no. I knew Molven a little from Bergen, he seemed flattered that I had contacted him now, and Spartacus was a serious publishing house. But when we sat down in Odda he initially wanted to speak about something else. No, he didn't want any blurbs; he had in mind a biography about Axel Jensen, however, and wondered if I would like to write it. I didn't say no, even though I would never write a biography about anyone for as long as I lived, nor did I say yes. When that was clear we spoke a little about Geir's book. He said it sounded interesting and he would like to read it. We shook hands, and I walked over to Yngve, who had been sitting nearby waiting, we were going to drive to the ferry. I decided not to tell Geir that Molven had asked me to write a biography for him. There was something unpleasant about everyone on all sides trying to get a chunk of me, I owed Geir so much and I didn't want his book to be about my name.

On the ferry Yngve and I had a coffee, on the quay on the other side we had a smoke, and then he drove to Voss while I made my way toward Flesland Airport. It was autumn, the air was cold, sharp, and clear, the sky cloudless and blue, the sun heavy and drunk with light. Yngve had lent me a CD, it was the first by Dire Straits, I had it on full volume in the rental car, it was the one we played when I was in fifth grade and he was in ninth at Tybakken, and the atmosphere of that time filled my head, the Norwegian seventies, the soft snow, quilted jackets.

Alongside the glinting fjord. Past red, yellow, brown, green trees. Up the mountainside. And then, ahead of me on the road, a dog. I jumped on the brakes, but ran over it anyway, there was a thud and the dog was thrown into the ditch. I stopped the car, switched off the engine, and got out, a man came walking across a yard toward me. I looked for the dog, but it wasn't there. The man pointed. The dog was running up a path on the other side of the road. How was that possible? I had been doing at least fifty kph when I hit it. I keep telling them they should keep the dog on a leash, said the man, who was in his forties, as he came to a halt in front of me. What happened? I said. How could the dog have survived that? You hit it with your bumper. It might be hurt, but it doesn't look like it, he said. Does it come from up there? I said, nodding toward the farm above the road. He nodded. I'd better go up and tell them, I said. He nodded again and accompanied me. The dog was lying in the yard when we arrived, it wasn't squealing or anything, seemed healthy and happy. An old man was there, I walked over to him, explained what had happened and apologized, the dog seemed to be fine though. Thank you, he said. And then I walked back down, got into the car, and drove on. I thought about Vanja, as she loved dogs more than anything else. She knew the names of most breeds and we had to read to her from a dog book almost every day. If we were out and came across a dog we had to ask if she could pet it. Sometimes she asked if she could borrow my phone and take pictures of the dogs we saw. She wasn't allowed to have a dog until she was twelve, which she negotiated down to ten. Now she was eight. I was looking forward to telling her about the incident. If the dog had died I wouldn't have said a word. But it had been fine. I could tell her.

At Flesland I parked the rental car, handed over the keys, checked in, and flew home.

In the following weeks I finished off the third novel. In Odda, Tore had promised to help me with it because it was long and shapeless, that is, its sole principle of form was chronology. Tore had read it, made a few suggestions, which I had accepted, but it hadn't been enough, something more radical was needed, some twist or other. While I was working in Malmö the evening before I had to hand it in, Tore was skimming through it in Stavanger, and he called when he found a turning point around which the whole novel could revolve, and sent me lots of texts throughout the evening and night. By the morning it was finished. I had followed his instructions to the letter. Just a few days later Book 2 came out. Geir called in the morning, and even though I had told him not to mention a word that was written about me, he insisted on reading the Aftenposten review. You've got to hear it, he said. Come on, you can take it. But it's not what it says or doesn't say that bothers me, I said. It's the fact that it's there at all. You know how it fucks me up inside. Come on, he said. Just this once. Never again. OK, I said. And he read it to me. All I remember from it is one sentence: "Well, is the case actually statute-barred?" and I was described as "the possible perpetrator." The reviewer was wondering if I was the perpetrator of a sex offense and if the case was statute-barred. I remember because Geir was laughing so much as he read and because he repeated it several times. Have they lost their minds? he said. Have they utterly gone off their rockers? A few hours later I received an agitated e-mail from Tonje. She quoted from the same review, in which the following appeared: "For example the writer's former wife appears by name, and you can only imagine how unpleasant this publication must be for her now," and Tonje asked what that meant and why she hadn't been given the novel before it came out, if it was about her. Previously I'd sent her an e-mail where I asked her not to read the novel. I had done that because it wasn't about her, but about Linda and my feelings for Linda, and it had occurred to me that it might hurt Tonje to read about how in love I was only a few weeks after we had broken up. Now Tonje thought I had kept this from her, that I had deceived her. All of Norway would be reading about her while she was left in the dark. That I might have done something to spare her was so naïve that she didn't believe me for a second. The pressure was so great, the phone calls from the media so incessant that it was impossible to maintain this perspective. The damage was done in the book, not when she read it. I hadn't written about her, but I had written about something of which she had no knowledge and which had happened while we were together: I had fallen in love with Linda. Wham. She was the one. An arrow to the heart. But what kind of heart? Everything was a blur during those days, I fell headlong, there was no reciprocation, Linda turned away, and I cut up my face, left everything, and traveled home. It was the most intense experience of my life. I had been in a place I didn't know existed. The world was a river of impressions and I was connected to them, that was how it felt, everything had significance, I could examine an acorn for ten minutes as though it contained the secret of the universe, which it did, that was why I stared at it. In that state I saw Linda and was hypnotized by her, but nothing happened, we didn't even touch. She was becoming manic; I was, without any doubt, manic. Writing a book about my life was inconceivable without including the feelings I'd had then and what happened to me. But it was a torment for Tonje and I was the tormentor. I e-mailed and tried to explain, but that only made things worse, you cannot be both tormentor and consoler. She sent a furious e-mail to my editor, who had publicly stated that all the characters appearing in the novel had been given the manuscript to read beforehand. She had not. So, in the gloom of the Internet café reading her e-mail and all the others that had come in over the past two months, I found myself in a place I had never been before, in a world of lawyers who scrutinized every word I wrote, with threats of legal action and public accusations of lying, reviews calling me immoral and where everyone I had been or was close to suffered because of me. While I was writing I didn't think about them, but as the publication date approached they suddenly loomed large, as they really were, and the repercussions revealed themselves to me. The conflict was between the novels and their consequences. The approach I chose was to publish the novels, allow whatever happened to happen, with all the pain I'd inflicted that brought, and hope the wounds could be healed. In general terms I was able to defend this approach as I knew what I was looking for and the value of it, but not in specific cases, regarding the consequences for every individual I had written about. No one has the right to inflict injury on another person. Sitting in front of the screen in the computer games bunker, I was afraid, desperate, and sorry, but I also knew these feelings would disappear when I wrote and would therefore come and go because in the written "I" the social "we" disappeared and the "I" was free. It was only when I got up and left my desk that the "we" returned and I was able to feel ashamed at what I had written and thought, with varying degrees of intensity, according to how deeply I was in the writing process. The social dimension is what keeps us in our places, which makes it possible for us to live together; the individual dimension is what ensures that we don't merge into each other. The social dimension is based on taking one another into consideration. We also do this by hiding our feelings, not saying what we think, if what we feel or think affects others. The social dimension is also based on showing some things and hiding others. What should be shown and what should be hidden are not subject to disagreement because they are connected with the "we." The regulatory mechanism is shame. One of the questions this book raised for me when I was writing it was what was there to gain by contravening social norms, by describing what no one wants to be described, in other words, the secret and the hidden. Let me put it another way: what value is there in not taking others into account? The social dimension is the world as it should be. Everything that is not as it should be is hidden. My father drank himself to death, that is not how it should be, that has to be hidden. My heart yearned for another woman, that is not how it should be, it must be hidden. But he was my father and it was my heart. I shouldn't write that because the consequences affect not only me, but also others. Yet it is true. To write these things you have to be free, and to be free you have to be inconsiderate to others. It is an equation that doesn't work. Truth equals freedom equals being inconsiderate and is on the individual side of the equation; being considerate and secrecy are on the social side, but only as an abstraction, like an inner entity in the "I" because in reality there is no such thing as the social dimension, only single human beings, our "you" in other words, also on the individual side. Tonje isn't a "character." She is Tonje. Linda isn't a character. She is Linda. Geir Angell isn't a character. He is Geir Angell. Vanja, Heidi, and John, they exist, they are in bed asleep about a hundred kilometers away from where I am sitting at this moment. They are real. And if you want to describe reality as it is, for the individual, and there is no other reality, you have to really go there, you can't be considerate. And it hurts. It hurts not to be considered and it hurts not to be considerate. This novel has hurt everyone around me, it has hurt me, and in a few years, when they are old enough to read it, it will hurt my children. If I had made it more painful, it would have been truer.

It has been an experiment, and it has failed because I have never even been close to saying what I really mean and describing what I have actually seen, but it is not valueless, at least not completely, for when describing the reality of an individual person, when attempting to be as honest as possible is considered immoral and scandalous, the force of the social dimension is visible and also the way it regulates and controls individuals. Its power is enormous, for what I have written about have been exclusively everyday events, there has been nothing sensational about any of it, these things happen all the time, every single day, and everyone knows they do: alcoholism, infidelity, mental illness, and masturbation, just to cite some of what has found its way from the novels into newspaper headlines. The only unusual aspect in this case has been that normality has been associated with real names in a novel and communicated for what it is, something specific tied to certain persons. The novel is a public form, and therein lies the contravention of the norm, the specific and the personal have been transported into the public arena. It happens to all people in the public eye – actors, politicians, TV journalists, pop stars – but they have chosen it of their own free will and want nothing more than this. The only nonpublic people who find themselves thrust there are criminals. In this novel it has happened to ordinary people, who are not criminals. Accordingly their names have taken on criminal form, an ordinary name has crossed the bounds of normality and become so abnormal that journalists track down the person and write about them in the newspapers. What these people did, which was perfectly normal, also took on criminal form and found itself being judged. And I was the person who had turned them into criminals. But I didn't think about any of this at the time, during the many mornings I spent in the Internet café and my study, and the scant defense I was able to erect for my actions, such as that I was only writing about myself, crumbled as soon as one of the people I had written about turned and looked at me. They did it one after the other and I looked down, I looked away, I stared at a page in the novel and continued to write.

The same day that Geir read the Aftenposten review to me on the balcony, Asbjørn and Yngve came to Malmö. We were going to the Wilco gig in Copenhagen that evening and they would be staying with us over the weekend. I shook Asbjørn's hand, then Yngve's, and made a point of looking them in the eye, and I knew they were thinking that I was thinking about what I had written about this very thing. They'd brought candy for the children, and Asbjørn had framed the cover photo that he had taken in his capacity as a book designer and we had used for the first novel, and gave it to me along with a pile of books he had doubles of. Heidegger's Sein und Zeit, which I only had in English, Pascal's Pensées – I had the old, much-abridged edition – plus many more. They had also brought the day's papers with them. I held up a hand and turned my head away, but Linda took them, she was curious, and even though I said she shouldn't, she sat at the kitchen table reading them while Ingrid looked over her shoulder. I saw the front-page headline: EXPOSES FAMILY – ALCOHOL AND MENTAL PROBLEMS, and I saw the headline inside: EXPOSES WIFE. Then I returned to Yngve and Asbjørn, who were putting their luggage in the living room. We went to the balcony and smoked a cigarette. Asbjørn said he'd been a bit wary when he heard that Linda's mother would be here, he wasn't quite sure what the atmosphere would be like between us after what I'd written. I said she was the larger-than-life type and it would be fine. But it was Ingrid rather than Linda I wanted to keep away from the newspapers. Because Linda was her daughter, and now the papers were saying I had hung her daughter out to dry with her mental problems. And ALCOHOL, that couldn't refer to anyone else but Ingrid. I knew how deeply this had hurt her as she had told Linda so, and she had also maintained it wasn't true. The pain was there, still smoldering and glowing. But a pile of newspapers was one thing, a book another, and an article in the press about it a third. It was getting closer all the time. For Swedes Norway was a distant country, but if the book came out in Sweden, in her own language – a decision hadn't been taken yet, but it was likely – it would impinge on her life and the consequences would be real.

Linda left to pick up the children, and when Asbjørn walked past the kitchen on his way to the bathroom, he saw Ingrid reading the newspaper, she looked up and gave him a thumbs-up. He laughed when he saw that. I wondered what she was thinking. That it was good for the book that it was receiving attention, and thus for the family, her grandchildren, who might finally get a house to live in? And a car to be driven around in?

Half an hour later, when the children came in through the door, they behaved differently from usual. As always when there was a visitor in the apartment, they reminded me of animals. Alert, watchful, cautious, they sniffed around. Hm. Unfamiliar shoes. Unfamiliar jackets. Best to be on your guard here. Vanja was the most guarded, Heidi the next, and John definitely the least. He smiled at everyone. We ate at the table in the living room, the children slipped down from their chairs after a few minutes and disappeared into their room with their bags of candy. I was happy, I always was when I was with Asbjørn and Yngve, although it was a bit odd because it was the two of them who were friends and formed a unit, I was more of a spectator or a distant associate, and not Yngve and I, who were brothers and had the same blood. The dynamics between us were exactly the same as they had been in Bergen when I arrived there in 1989, they were the experienced, worldly-wise ones, I was the novice who didn't know his way around, and nothing of what had happened in our lives since then had changed that. Perhaps that was what I liked, not being in charge, tagging along, being the little brother.

Heidi came in, sent Asbjørn a mischievous look, and asked him what his name was again.

"Asbjørn," he said.

"Isbjørn," Heidi said. Polar bear.

"No," Asbjørn said. "Asbjørn."

"Isbjørn," Heidi said, laughed, and ran off to join the others.

"Actually we're all characters in a novel sitting around this table," Yngve said.

"That's true," Asbjørn laughed.

"We should set up a web page for characters in a novel so that we can discuss our experiences," Yngve said.

"I can be the moderator," I said.

"What was it like to read that you'd been exposed?" Yngve said, looking at Linda.

"No problem," Linda said. "The worst part is being in the paper, if you know what I mean. Then people believe I've been exposed. Otherwise I'd just have been a description in a book. And, of course, that's not the same."

"In fact you two are the only ones who have censored me," I said. "Over such trivialities though. I wrote one thing about you," I said, focusing on Yngve, "I was sure you would be proud of. But no. So, out it went."

"What was that?" Asbjørn said.

"I can't tell you," I said. "But it was something to do with a note we once put on his door."

"Groupies must leave before breakfast?" Asbjørn said.

"Maybe," I said. "And Linda said she really hadn't whipped the donkey at the fun fair."

Ingrid laughed.

"I don't want that on my record, that I whip animals. Anyway, it didn't happen."

"No, it really didn't," I said. "I must've been trying to capture the atmosphere of aggression."

"Thank you for the meal," Asbjørn said, looking at Ingrid. "It was fantastic."

"It was," I said.

We got up and took our plates into the kitchen. Then we went to the balcony for a smoke, Linda and Yngve in the two chairs, Asbjørn and I standing with our backs to the railing.

"This vaguely reminds me of my fortieth," I said. "Wasn't everyone out here at some point? I just remember us standing here packed in like sardines. And I thought about that crack."

I pointed to the crack in the wall, which presumably was just on the surface because if not the whole balcony would have crashed down.

"Oh shit," Asbjørn said.

"Helena thought everyone at the party was so rar," Linda said in Swedish. "She returned to it again later. The man sleeping in the children's room, wasn't he fantastic? And the one who didn't say a word all evening, what was up with him? And the one . . . you've got the idea."

"Well, we are," Yngve said in Norwegian.

"Are what?"

"Rar, strange," he said.

"Rar in Swedish means nice," I said.

The Wilco gig took place in the old theater in Copenhagen, we had bought tickets separately, so I was sitting right out on the edge of a balcony close to the stage, but the sound probably wouldn't be very good, I thought as I took my seat, while Yngve and Asbjørn, I discovered after painstakingly scanning the audience, were like two birds on a perch under the ceiling, where the sound would probably be much better.

I sat back in the seat, which was upholstered in red velvet, and gazed across, not focusing on anything in particular. I was exhausted, and it was good to be surrounded by other people and to have peace and quiet. I hadn't been to a concert since I lived in Norway. It was a big thing when a band came to town then. Now David Byrne could play in a pub two hundred meters from our apartment and I wouldn't go. I had lost music, which had once meant so much to me, it was no longer relevant, a bit like watching TV. Now and then it returned with the force of an ax biting into ice, bringing a sense of grief for everything else I had lost on the path I had trodden.

The warm-up band was Norwegian. They stood in the middle of the stage, which wasn't theirs, they'd rented it, and for some reason I was reminded of a tent pitched in a parking lot, that was what they made me think of. Their sound was low and the lights remained on. But they were pretty good. Hukkelberg, I think that is what they were called.

I looked across the rows of seats and saw the two of them sitting at the top, glowing, sort of, they were the only two faces I recognized in a sea of strangers.

After reading Proust it was impossible not to see such an old theater as an underwater scene, a kind of coral reef with mussels or shells for seats and fishtails or jellyfish tentacles for women's dresses. The way he transformed everything and imbued it with magic is no longer possible, I thought, because everything has already changed, everything is already something else, pervaded by fiction as it were. We can strip down reality, layer by layer, and never reach its core, for what the last layer covers over is the most unreal of all, the greatest fiction of them all, the true nature of things.

The lights dimmed. A spotlight focused on the stage. Jeff Tweedy, chubby, almost a bit fat, came straight to the microphone, started playing at once and sang in a pure, clear voice, effortless. You could never count on this with English bands, at least not those I had seen live in my time. The exception was Blur, whom I saw with Tore at Sentrum in 1993. Everything they did was not only pitch perfect, but also full of the energy only young people have who want something and suddenly realize they can actually achieve it. But Wilco was American, the music wasn't for show, they were inside it. The other band members came on, they played for an hour and a half, maybe two, it was so peaceful sitting there, and at times the music had such an emotional intensity that I lost all control and just cried. Afterwards, excited after this excursion back into early adulthood, we met outside and went and got drunk. I'd told them that trains ran all night, but when we arrived at the station, it was closed and we had to take a taxi the whole way to Malmö. Over the bridge the night felt like enclosing walls, the lights shivering as they lit up more and more meters of grayish asphalt, I felt as if I were in a dream. The next day the angst was immense, but I still went out with them, we ate at an Asian restaurant and Asbjørn regaled us with stories he'd heard from a doctor friend, who had told him about all the objects people stuffed up their asses when they were alone and then were unable to retrieve.

In late autumn my first novel was nominated for the Brage Prize and I flew to Oslo with Linda to attend the award ceremony. After we had dropped off our luggage at the hotel she went to the hairdresser's to have her hair done, or styled, maybe the term is, while I popped into the publishing house to talk to Geir. On my return I knocked on the door and Linda opened up sporting her new hairstyle.

"What do you think?" she said. "Honestly."

At first I didn't answer, I went into the room and sat down. Did she want me to confirm what she herself thought and say it was great or did she want, as she said, an honest answer?

I thought it looked terrible and had a feeling that she might think so too.

"It looks like what a fifty-year-old might consider nice," I said.

"Yes, doesn't it. Isn't it awful?"

"It is."

"Good. Then I'll wash it out and go as normal."

Elisabeth, who worked at the publishing house, came to pick us up, then we took a taxi to the ceremony. Big building, lots of people, a room for the nominees. To my horror, I saw an Aftenposten journalist that I had written about in Book 2, and I hadn't minced my words. As soon as he saw me he came over and introduced himself. Did I remember him? Indeed I did, I said. He laughed and said it was an honor to appear in my book, even in the way he did. And then he said, But you were wrong about one thing. I'm not a privileged Oslo West kid. No? I said. I'm sorry. And then I noticed

Kjartan Fløgstad, my old hero, the gentleman socialist writer I had also written about. I introduced Linda, he introduced his wife, we exchanged a few words while I kept looking around, I didn't want to be here, I couldn't stay here, I couldn't stand this. Ragnar Hovland, my old writing teacher, he was there. I stood around, and then I persuaded Linda to go out for a smoke by the entrance where people were still streaming in. The darkness was good, the rain was good, all the wet, slippery brown leaves on the grass were good, but not the feeling that you were being watched, that wasn't good. When we sat down at the front, where two seats were reserved for us, beside Kjartan Fløgstad and his wife, a photographer leaned over from the balcony and took a photo of Linda. She didn't see, I said nothing, maybe I was wrong. The show started, there was music, there were readings and sketches, and I was close to throwing up because I could see the stage and feel the audience at my back, and if I won I would not only have to go up there, but also say something. Unfortunately it was me who had to go up. The statuette was as heavy as a murder weapon. Holding it in my hand, I had planned to say that many people who had read the book probably imagined that I would shed a tear, but I didn't dare, so I mumbled something about a character in the novel I had met in the bar, and talked about the time I had moved away from home and what books I had been reading then, which had been written by the other nominees. It was true, Roy Jacobsen had just brought out The New Water that year, and I had bought it and the first book by Fløgstad I had ever read, Dalen Portland. I thanked Linda and said she was the most generous person I had ever met, and I was happy I hadn't said anything about shedding a tear, my voice cracked a little when I spoke to Linda, she had been looking up at me from below. Then I went back and sat down. I wished that Fløgstad had been the one to rise to his feet and go up and accept the statuette, a thousand times over, he could also receive awards with dignity, I assumed, unlike me, who only wanted the floor to swallow me up in my shame and humiliation. Afterwards everyone repaired to a big Irish pub nearby. I sat with Linda and Frederik and some of his colleagues in the courtyard, the rain dripping down the walls and tent poles, or whatever they were called, the supports holding up the temporary roof. Frederik had met Linda the summer we got together, at the time he was visiting us with Kjetil and Richard and we all went on a pub crawl. They were talking now, I stared into the distance drinking beer, I occasionally answered a question from the others, that was how life had become, I was someone you asked questions. A well-known writer came over. We said hello, I was embarrassed, I knew he didn't like what I wrote. He had mentioned this once and been ironic, which made this even harder. But he didn't want to say just hello and congratulate me, he wanted to talk, and he spent at least five minutes refining his attitude to me and my books, he couldn't say straight out that he didn't like them, that they were bad in other words, but nor could he not say that, so what came out of his mouth was impossible to grasp. Why he was saying what he was saying? Was it something social that had to be cleared out of the way before we could talk? Or were there some aesthetic reflections which he thought it important to state, so that I wouldn't believe he was there on any other premise? He stood there for so long that his role imperceptibly changed from that of someone who had come over to say hello to someone who had a seat at the table. He was pleasant, he always had been, but why was he at my table? Did he like my books? Apparently not. Did he like me? Perhaps, perhaps not. But the odds of him coming over to my table because I was a reclusive author who tinkered with words in a valley in Vestland were low, I suspected, unless this reclusive author was considered the pick of his colleagues. Then he would have come. As indeed would I. Once I had been talking to a writer and her husband at a table in a restaurant in a tiny Norwegian town during a literary festival, and Lars Saabye Christensen sat down at the same table, I glanced over at him, didn't quite catch what my conversation partner said, and as soon as I got the chance I turned to him, didn't we have the same publishing house in England? I did that despite seeing that she had noticed my glances at Saabye Christensen and understood exactly how my mind was working. It still wasn't too late to save the situation, but my desire to talk to him was greater than the certainty that I was making a bad impression. At the same festival the emcee and I were rebuked by the wife of one of the writers because the emcee had devoted more time and emotion to my book than her husband's. This mixture of the highest and the lowest and most basic that literature can be is typical of the writer milieu, and it's hardly surprising, there are few areas of life where people invest so much of themselves to gain so little. The year I made my debut, late one evening I was sitting with Erik Fosnes Hansen in a hotel room, flattered to be talking to him, even if I hadn't read anything by him since he made his ridiculously young debut with The Falcon Tower, a novel I read when I was at gymnas, I happened to mention Vagant and it was like waving a red rag to a bull. Vagant! he yelled. He had sold hundreds of thousands of books, they were published all over the world, he received good reviews everywhere, but not in Vagant, they barely considered him a writer, this tiny literary magazine that in reality consisted of a handful of young people who gathered in cafés in the East End of Oslo. He despised them. Wishy-washy chitchat and academic intellectualism, he said. Why? He didn't say, but I imagine a lack of acknowledgment on their part might have played a role. When my first book began to sell I was worried about my status. For a while joining the editing team at Vagant saved me, and it was quite perfect from a strategic point of view, there I was both a big-time and a small-time writer, wriggling my way upward and meeting more and more names on the way, until one rainy autumn evening I ended up in one of Oslo's Irish pubs and the big names came to me. Knausgaard had become a trademark, a logo, the newspapers had been full of it that autumn, and now I could feel how much energy lay in its proliferation. People looked at me. People apologized to me before saying anything. People didn't dare speak. People came over when they were drunk. It was remarkable. And it wasn't the books I had written because they were pretty run-of-the mill – two sons who bury their dead father and a frustrated father of small children who strips himself naked for the reader – it was the name and all the resonance it contained now.

I liked it that a well-known author came over to our table that evening. It gave me a feeling of power. This feeling meant that I could say what I liked or refuse to say anything at all, it didn't matter, nothing would change as a result. When I met him for the first time I was a student in a writing course that he taught; when I met him for the second time I was a student with hubris, going around and interviewing all of Norway's famous writers. I had to put in an enormous effort even to be worth his time; when I interviewed him I had prepared for several weeks and done nothing else but. I had devised smart, probing, worthy questions which some years later I realized were totally transparent and laid me bare, and this was not only the case with him but everyone I met: final-year students, professors, writers, editors, and journalists, and as I was so immensely prestige-oriented, the bigger or more prestigious the name, the more I exerted myself. Oh, the time Professor Buvik not only remembered my name but also asked me a question during a lecture. The first time I met Jonny Halberg, Tone Hødnebø. Henning Hagerup. Eldrid Lunden. Thure Erik Lund. Ingvar Ambjørsen. Cecilie Løveid. Olav H. Hauge. Marit Christensen. Øystein Rottem. Kjartan Fløgstad. Ole Robert Sunde. Georg Johannesen. Kjersti Holmen. Erlend Loe. Åsne Seierstad. William Nygaard. Kjetil Rolness. Einar Økland. Frode Grytten. Trond Giske. I'd understood that the only way of managing was to act as if this didn't mean a thing, as if you were completely uncorrupted, while inside you were thrilled by the meeting and hoped someone would notice. It wasn't until I was sitting in this pub that I realized there was some movement and a goal, my name was suddenly so emotive that others were behaving toward me as I had previously behaved toward other emotive names. Not that I didn't understand what they were doing, I knew from my own experience, I knew all about the base, all too human art of fawning. That is why I also understood that it had nothing to do with me, for I had been the same, with my tongue hanging out of my mouth for all those years, making myself appear better than I was by behaving how the uncorrupted behave, which was no more than a more sophisticated form of corruption, I had been the same. All that had changed was the name and the associated image. I had always done readings for a fee of fifteen hundred kroner, but now I was being offered sixty thousand for a forty-five-minute gig. I turned it down, not because I didn't want the money, but because I wanted to have something that was worth more, namely integrity; not because I was someone with integrity, but because I was someone who was doubly corrupt. Yes, I was so corrupt that I no longer cared what Vagant might think about what I wrote, as, in the values hierarchy, not caring ranked higher than caring, and the hierarchy was all I cared about. That is how it was. I had sold my soul twice, it was nothing worse than that, I was at the top. If you showed you wanted to be at the top and basked in the glory, you weren't at the top after all because you were only at the top if your integrity was intact and you said no. No to newspapers, no to TV, no to social gatherings and performances. You were only at the top if you said no to the top, but not even that was the absolute top because there were those who really didn't care, who sat alone and unsung in some valley writing their stubborn, angry, uncompromising prose – if we are talking about authors at the pinnacle – and who would be happiest not even sending their work to a publishing house but burying it in the forest and starting on the next.

When the evening was over, Linda and I, holding the statuette in one hand, walked to the hotel arm-in-arm. She was hungry, I went down to the 7-Eleven to buy some food for her, and on the way back I burst into laughter, it came from nowhere, and I stopped and turned to the wall. Ha ha ha, I laughed. Ha ha ha. Then I carried on walking, through the rain and darkness, over the shimmering asphalt, to the hotel, which was the Savoy, where I stopped again and lit a cigarette, the last before going to bed. I didn't know what I had been laughing at, but just the thought of it made me laugh again. Ha ha ha. Ha ha ha. Ha ha ha.

I was still chortling when I entered our room. Linda had gone to sleep. I sat down on the bed and placed my hand on her brow. You wanted something to eat, didn't you? I said. But she was too far into the darkness of her soul, so I pulled a chair over to the window, sat down, ate her food, and drank a Pepsi Max looking out the window and watching the rain fall and the lamp hanging from a thin wire across the street swing back and forth in the wind.

One weekend at the end of May 2010 I rented a car and drove to the cabin outside Malmö to sort out the chaos there. Linda had put the property up for sale, there had already been one viewing, but no one had been interested, and no wonder, nothing had been done to hide the neglect. The thought of it, how everything had gone to the dogs, had been on my mind for ages. After emerging from the last roundabout and entering the subdivision area, which extended on both sides of the street and consisted of several hundred small cabins with small gardens, almost all impeccably maintained, the thought weighed more heavily on me than before. The fact that I was actually here and would soon be coming to grips with the mess was like a light inside me. Not a flame or a shimmer, more like a clearing you approach in the forest, the expectation of it.

There was supposed to be another viewing the following day, and if I could tackle the worst of the neglect it was not impossible that someone might make an offer, they might even be drawn to its dilapidated state and the idea of fixing it up.

The sky was gray and wintry, and the people I saw along the road, some kids on bikes and a woman pushing a stroller and carrying a heavy Co-op bag, were not in contact with it, the way crabs are not in contact with the surface of the sea, it struck me as I drove along at thirty kph. The leaves on the trees had just come out, but without any sun it was difficult to associate them with the life that spring always ushers in.

I downshifted and turned into the large gravel parking lot. I had pains in my stomach. This was a place you were seen not as the person you were, whatever that might be, but as how you appeared. Here I was a man with long greasy hair and a beard, wearing old black clothes, with wild eyes and restless movements, and when this tramp-like figure arrived with our three children, I saw myself so clearly through the other cabin owners' eyes, and all my inner confidence and dignity simply vanished. If someone had called social services and told them to come and rescue the children from this terrible father, possibly a drug addict, definitely dubious, I would have been on the defensive, I would have felt there was something in that and would only have defended myself halfheartedly.

I drove to the barrier in front of the gravel road at the other end of the parking lot, stopped, got out, opened the barrier, swung it to the side, got in and drove forward a few meters, got out and closed the barrier, continued my journey at a snail's pace between the little wooden cabins. The gravel crunched beneath the tires and the car glided forward like a barge up the narrow canal-like road, past gate after gate until I stopped outside ours. It wasn't as clean and shiny as the others, but was covered with a layer of greenish algae or fungus. Nor was the fence free of foliage, like the others, as was stipulated in the rules: the hedge on the inside grew between the cracks in the fence and well above the top. I switched off the engine, took out the key, and noticed the sign that had appeared on the fence since I was last here. TILL SALU, for sale, it said in blue on white. I opened the car door, got out, and closed it again. I felt the chill air on my face and hands. The gravel was overgrown with weeds, thereby breaking another of the rules, and when I saw that I felt a pain in my stomach. I wished I could have made myself not care, say to hell with the idiots who sat scrutinizing other people's gardens, this feeble-minded bunch of wrinkled old folk with sagging skin who were unable to think about anything except what was right and fair and spent their remaining years and days, replete with all the experience a long and unique life had given them, keeping a lawn manicured and foaming with indignation when others did not. I wished I didn't care about them, but I did. The truth was that I feared them and really wanted to make peace with them.

I opened the gate and went into the garden.

Why hadn't she cut the grass? Overgrown beds was one thing, they would take weeks to clear, but the lawn? What had she been thinking when she put the plot up for sale. That the first impression wasn't important? That potential buyers would ignore the neglect and think, actually, this is a nice place?

I turned. From the window of the doll's house on the other side of the road an old dear was staring at me. Her husband had been the chairman of the owners' association. It was his responsibility to make sure that all the cabin owners behaved as they should. So when I caught the bus here to water the grass one Wednesday evening, after a few days of desert heat, he was the one who strolled over to the fence, by chance as it were, always by chance, to ask if I knew what day it was. Yes, indeed I did, it was Wednesday, wasn't it? Yes, it was. And we have a system here, you know, regarding watering. Odd numbers water on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays while even numbers water on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays. What are you? I was obliged to confess that I was an even number and therefore not entitled to do any watering. So it was a case of either catching the bus home or defying him and keeping the hose low behind the house, where no one could see me. Of course that was what I did, sitting on the doorstep and smoking, fearful that he would spot me. Or we all came here one Saturday afternoon and slept over, with the ulterior motive of cutting the grass, which was done all too seldom. And who happened to walk past our fence then but the chairman? You're cutting your grass, I can hear, he said. Yes, I am. It's gotten terribly long. Yes, he said. But you're not allowed to use any machines from four o'clock on a Saturday afternoon until Monday morning, because of the noise. We like to have some peace and quiet. However you can mow the lawn this afternoon and you'll know for next time. Oh, thank you very much, I said. That's very kind of you.

Then there were the pieces of paper they left in the mailbox after their rounds of inspection. A printed form on which they ticked various boxes according to what they had observed.

I rounded the corner of the house, and out of sight of the neighbors I sat on the doorstep, lit a cigarette, and tried to draw up a plan of action. From the highway to Denmark came a faint drone, in waves, as well as dull thuds and shouts from a football field nearby. I had never seen it, only the floodlights around it, which were switched on every evening and in the autumn and winter stood like a luminous hangar on the dark plain.

That autumn and winter I had been out here writing, alone in this great expanse of cabins, I collected water in a canister from over by the parking lot, went shopping in a supermarket a few kilometers away, knocked off page after page, three or four days in a row, returned home, stayed there for some days, then came back here. Where I was completely disconnected. No newspapers, no Internet, no TV, no radio, just a cell phone, but no one had the number. And not a soul around. In the evening and at night a hedgehog, which slunk through the garden and occasionally, if I was sitting still, nudged its snout against my shoe. During the day the birds. I sat in front of my computer wearing a hat and gloves, a jacket, a blanket or a duvet over my lap. The air was like smoke around my head in the cold light of my lamp. I wrote about my childhood and my teenage years. I had telephone conversations with Geir, whom I read to and I discussed things with, telephone conversations with Linda, who had her mother over to help with the children and who during the hours they were off at school never quite knew what to do or how to do it. The hours that stretched out before her were more frightening than rewarding, I knew. It had been like that for a long time. She had office space in a collective but was scared to go there, forced herself a couple of times but was absent for weeks at a time.

It was a nice office, she had a Mac with a voice-recognition program on the desk, pictures of the children beside it, books on the shelves for inspiration. Once she took Heidi with her and Heidi had been proud to go to work with Mommy, she had said hi to the others and sat drawing, and I could see how happy Linda was when she came home, for that day she had been like other parents, she had her child with her at work, she had shown her off to her colleagues and let Heidi see what she did for a living. Nevertheless, she went there less and less.

In Linda something weighed her down and lifted her up. She had to fight it because when it weighed her down everything was black and without hope, and when it lifted her up, it was bright and hopeful, and that colored everything, her whole existence, which kept changing dramatically in this way, even though it was the same.

When I met her for the first time she was on her way up, and at that time it didn't stop, it didn't turn, just carried on and on, there were no limits, she didn't sleep anymore, the day was endless, and finally a girlfriend found her in her apartment hunched up on a table, mumbling numbers. Linda has stars inside her, and when they shine, she shines, but when they don't, the night is pitch black. She spent more than a year in a psychiatric hospital, and when I met her and we got together she hadn't been out long. We had children almost at once, we both wanted them. I never thought about her having been ill, I wasn't frightened of it, and that confidence was perhaps what made the thought of children possible for her or at least what made it easier.

In the maternity clinic she had to put a cross by "psychological illness" on all the forms, and I saw how that conditioned the midwife's view of Linda and me, although Linda was fine now. Her mood went in cycles, she plummeted and soared, but always within a normal range, I never thought about it, that was the way she was, temperamental, and I didn't react to her happiness when she was happy or the darkness when she was depressed or full of impetuous fury, I reacted to her, to what she said and did.

She tried all kinds of methods to stabilize her emotions because this took its toll on her, everything changing, the life we lived, which was so different from the one we had before, with the responsibility for the children and all that entailed, the feeling of not being in control was the absolute worst. She feared chaos more than anything else. She was petrified of anything that smacked of irregularity because with her volatile nature the rest of what we had, our home, had to be as solid and constant as it could be. Everything was a threat to her. My time spent writing was a threat. She knew it was my job, and it gave me meaning, and when she was fine it wasn't a problem, until her spirits sank and the fear came, then it became a threat as well, and she couldn't stand up to fear, it was insatiable.

It was at its height when she was pregnant with Vanja, she was terrified of losing her, she was terrified of the imminent responsibility, and she expelled her fear in great outbursts. I responded to these outbursts, which I considered unreasonable, while being afraid of them, they were so violent, I wasn't used to such strong inner forces, where I came from everything was controlled and rationalized. Vanja arrived, peace settled over us. Linda went to school, Heidi arrived, we moved to Malmö, John arrived. There was a lot of work, but it wasn't a problem for me, whatever it was; nor was housework a problem. You just had to get on with it. I took things as they came and wanted Linda to grit her teeth as well and tough it out.

What did she have?

She had her radio training, but that was already a long time ago, and she hadn't done any radio since, getting back into it, calling the station and saying she had an idea became more difficult by the day. She had bought a microphone and an editing program, that was as far as she had got.

She also had her writing. The oldest texts were from long before we met, the most recent ones she wrote last year. They were sensationally good. She sent them to her old publishing house. They were rejected, short stories were too difficult during tough times for publishers, they said. There wasn't a market for them, they didn't have the money. She sent them to three other houses, two of them never read the collection, the third said no. My two novels came out, the third was in the pipeline, and while I was writing the fourth Linda called Sveriges Radio and put forward an idea she had for a documentary. It was a big step and a turning point, the conversation was a commitment, the producer wanted to meet her, they met and she had faith in Linda. This time something would come of it. They agreed on a work plan. Linda was excited, full of energy and ideas, we sat on the balcony after the children were in bed and talked about everything she was going to do. She went to Stockholm to interview the Swedish astronaut Fuglesang, then up to Norrland, where she visited a commercial space station and interviewed the employees.

The documentary was based on the Hindenburg's last flight, she had once come across some articles from the time in a Swedish paper, from which it appeared that a Swedish journalist had been on board and telegraphed reports of the journey several times a day. He died when the airship caught fire and burned up on the other side of the Atlantic just before docking at its destination. It was a brilliant story, which would be contrasted with one about space travel.

She was away for eight days doing research and called me full of enthusiasm from her hotel room. She had ridden on a dogsled, stayed in an ice hotel, wandered around an area full of space junk. She had spoken to a lot of people and arranged to meet them, it almost seemed as though she was also friends with them as some of what she told me could only have been said in confidence.

Her voice at the other end sounded excited and full of life. I went to the balcony, sat down clad in a hat and coat, and smoked. The children were asleep. I felt a strange unease. It was as though I wasn't in actual communication with her.

"I walked around the area. It was enormous, covered with snow, and everywhere there were big chunks of metal. It was a space cemetery. Can you imagine that, Karl Ove?"

"Sounds exciting," I said. "Did you interview anyone?"

"No, I just walked around with the microphone talking about what I could see. But I know it was good. It was so fantastic there."

"OK."

"And now the stars are so clear. Can you imagine what it's like up here?"

"Do you have to get up early tomorrow?" I said.

"Yes, oh, the man from the ice hotel, sorry, I just have to tell you this before I forget, he said we absolutely have to come up here together. We can have a room for free."

"An ice hotel? You're kidding."

"It's very special up here, you know. In a way, it's magical."

"OK. Linda, I think I'll have to go to bed now if I'm going to have any chance with the kids tomorrow."

"Yes, I understand. Goodnight, my prince. I love you."

"Goodnight."

She came back home still excited by what she'd experienced and what she was going to do. She wrote a manuscript, the idea being that she would dramatize the zeppelin flight based on the journalist's reports. It was approved, a budget was set up. Linda hired actors, directed, and did the recording. She went to work at seven in the morning, came home at six in the evening. She was a changed person. I had seen her work as hard only once before, that was during the exam period at the drama institute, then she had given her all. But this was different. Now it was as though she was investing everything she had, her whole existence, as if it was now or never, not only for this documentary but for her whole life.

On the Friday evening after her first week of work we sat drowsily watching TV as the children slept.

"You'll take them tomorrow, won't you?" she said.

I looked at her.

"Why? What are you doing?"

"Working."

"Do you have to work on the weekend?"

"Yes, of course," she said. "It's important. There's a deadline."

Important? Deadline?

I started to fume inside. I looked at the TV screen for a few seconds. Then I turned back to her.

"Darling," I said. "You've always refused to let me work on the weekend because it's important we do something together as a family. I haven't worked one single weekend in seven years. And now you're going to work on the weekend?"

"How mean you are," she said. "You're so incredibly mean."

"So the family rule doesn't apply now that you've got a job?"

She got up.

"Where are you going?" I said.

"To bed," she said. "I have to be up early."

I stayed where I was, listening to her footsteps fade into the hall, I wanted to follow her and smooth things over, but I was still fuming inside, it wouldn't be a good conversation. Besides, I was actually happy that she was full of energy and determination, and in the long run perhaps there was a chance I would be able to work on the weekend.

Those were my thoughts. Actually it was good, actually it was as it should be.

She got up early the next morning and cycled to work. On Sunday we all went to Slottsparken, followed our usual route through the town to the first playground, which was really only a merry-go-round and a slide beneath some enormous deciduous trees whose crowns in the summer were like a ceiling, but now the branches were leafless beneath the gray sky, on to the second playground, across the park, which bordered a large residential area, where Linda and I stood beside each other in the wind keeping an eye on our children running around in their red all-weather jackets, Linda seemingly on her way down, inside herself for the first time in many weeks. At home the children watched a film while she rested and I read the Sunday papers. If she hadn't been obliged to work, with a schedule and a budget for what was a relatively large production, she would have been able to stay at home during the coming week, lie on the sofa, watch mediocre films, and sleep until the darkness and gloom disappeared. Now she couldn't, she had to work. On Monday morning she rose early and got herself ready while I took care of the children. I was rummaging through the shelves of clothes to find something for John to wear when she closed the bathroom door. Inside, she threw up. It lasted for several minutes. Then she opened the door, came out, went to the hatstand, where the coats were hanging, and put on her black leather jacket.

"Did you throw up?" I asked.

She nodded. Her face was white.

"But I'm going now. See you this afternoon. Don't know exactly when I'll be back. Six maybe."

She grabbed her bag and left while I continued to dress the children. After taking them to school, I returned, sat down, and worked on Book 4 all day, picked them up, cooked, and was eating with them when Linda arrived. She seemed drained. The next morning it was the same, she vomited in the toilet, then went to work, and the following morning again, and the one after that. I thought she was exaggerating, it was only a job after all, but of course I couldn't say that. After five years and three births, a life that consisted of nothing but children and childcare, with a few tentative attempts to get something up and running last year, this was her big chance, an opportunity for her to show what she was worth. Had it been anyone else she wanted to show I could have told her to take it easy, it wasn't that important, but she wanted to show herself that she had ability and there was nothing I could say to that. She was sick in the morning, went to work, came home in the evening, less and less confident. Her mother came down to help us and I was able to devote more time to writing.

At two o'clock on Friday I heard the front door open and ambled out to see who it was.

Linda, head bowed, was taking off her jacket without looking at me.

"Are you home already?" I said.

"I failed," she said. "I couldn't do it."

"Sorry?"

She was crying.

"I broke down in the control room," she said. "I realized I'd never be able to do it. It's just no good. It's no good, Karl Ove."

She went into the bedroom. I followed. It turned out the producer had said she should go home and take a couple of days off. The producer was strict and demanded a lot, she had understood what Linda was capable of, but perhaps not how fragile she was.

"I couldn't do it," she said. "I'm a fiasco."

Her mother came in, stopped in the doorway and retreated when she saw that Linda was crying.

"Are you sure?" I said.

"I can't get the two parts to gel," she said. "And now there's almost no time left. It won't work. It's impossible."

That was bad. A defeat after investing everything she had, it couldn't have been worse.

"Can't you make it simpler? Take a few shortcuts?"

She didn't answer. But after the children had gone to bed that evening she asked if I could listen to the little she had. Naturally, I said. In fact it was the last thing I wanted to do. I can handle my own failures, but not those of others.

She passed me the headset and pressed play.

It was good. Of course it was good. There wasn't much, but the little there was, was good.

On Monday she forced herself to go back, ashen-faced and determined. Her radio program had become a fixation, a much larger entity than itself, and when the producer said it wasn't working and would have to be completely rejigged, she collapsed again. Like the last time I thought it was really over, that she had failed, her race was run. And like the last time she gave it another shot.

Eventually the program was finished. I was invited to Sveriges Radio as a kind of test listener, and there we sat in a run-down studio in Malmö, two producers, one technician, Linda, and I.

I was almost angry when I heard the program. It was brilliant. I had believed Linda when she said it was a disaster, she hadn't given me any reason to believe anything else.

Afterwards she broke down. Over the following weeks, much longer than usual, she was in the grip of her darkness. She was quick to tears, watched films, said less than usual when we were alone together. With the children she made an effort to be as she always was with them, but I could see she was relieved when I took them out on my own. She would never do any radio again, she said. But when the darkness lifted, and light began to fill her, and her world became easier and easier, she started toying with the idea of other documentaries, she had a foot in the door.

I completed Book 4 after a week in the cabin, where I wrote night and day while the third book came out. All my old friends, to whom I had sent the manuscript, were keen to read about those days, all had consented to its publication. I received a lovely enthusiastic letter from my oldest friend, Geir Prestbakmo, whom I hadn't seen for thirty years. He described some scenes he remembered, among others, standing in a boathouse and holding a hose during a thunderstorm as we had heard that lightning didn't strike rubber. The spirit and tone of the letter were exactly as I remembered him. I spoke to Dag Lothar on the phone; he reminded me about the discussions we'd had about the connection between colors and the taste of hard candy and the summer we biked out past Eydehavn and played tennis. It felt as if I had given them our story, in a way, and not taken it. It was a good feeling. Everyone invited me back to visit them the next time I was in the area. The problems started again with Book 4. Instead of using authentic names and sending the manuscript to individuals, I used made-up names and just forged ahead with publication, I couldn't face another storm. But still people were angry. I wrote Book 5 in eight weeks, by then I really didn't give a damn, at the same time I found a tone that reminded me of the literature I used to read when I was the age I was describing, and it struck me this was the novel I had wanted to write when I was twenty, but I hadn't had it in me. Now I did. Last week Linda flew to Tenerife with our children, Helena, and her children, and I was finishing the book while the Winter Olympics were on TV, I sat on the sofa alone, cheering loudly when Northug, or "the wolf," as the Swedish commentators called him, won, and then I went into my study and carried on. When it was finished I sent it to the people I had described. Some were angry and said I had ruined their lives, I changed their names, some asked me to delete a couple of episodes as they contained a lot of dangerous things I hadn't understood at the time, and some said to leave it as it was. Tonje, who was the most important person in the book apart from Yngve, said to leave everything as it was. I asked Linda not to read it because it would be unpleasant to read about a love story with another woman. Similarly, but for a different reason, I had asked my mother not to read Book 3. After reading the second book she had texted me to say that it hurt to be demeaned. After reading Book 4 she called me and was as angry as she could be. I had written something that simply was not true, about what had happened between us when we lived in the house in Sandnes, to do with alcohol, and either I must have completely misunderstood or I'd made it up. I cut it. Dagsrevyen, NRK's evening news program, came and interviewed me, after it was over I returned home, got into bed, and could hardly move, I was paralyzed with fear, the interview would be on Saturday, all of Norway would see it, and I had barely managed to utter one coherent sentence.

The interviewer had shown me a magazine cover on which was written KNAUSGAARD FOR DUMMIES, and I realized as the camera focused on my face that something had happened to me in Norway that I hadn't grasped. I had become big. Some of this I had sensed in Oslo before Christmas when I went into a bookshop to do a signing, it was an event, there were TV cameras, radio microphones, camera flashes, and the shop was full to the rafters, and the line in front of the signing table, where I sat with mics by my mouth, was endless. After the signing I walked up to Litteraturhuset, the biggest room was sold out, and another room, where they had set up video cameras, was also full. Tore interviewed me, we repeated what we had done in Odda, but at that time interest had been burgeoning, here it was hysteria. Afterwards, on my way to the back room, a journalist followed me continually asking me whether I'd had sex with a thirteen-year-old. Then I went out with Tore and his girlfriend, we got drunk, and walking toward the hotel I saw the day's papers in a 7-Eleven. Dagsavisen had devoted its entire front page to a photo of me signing books. It was totally unreal and dreamlike, impossible to associate with me, so the cabin outside Malmö, where I headed the day after I came home, was as much a refuge as a place to write. Everything was as before, sitting in front of a computer screen. Three days there, home to the family, the Saint Lucia celebration in the school, Christmas with a full house, New Year's Eve. Out to the cabin, back to the family. No interviews, no papers, no TV, as it had been all autumn, and now I was doing the same all winter. Dagsrevyen was an exception, I had been awarded a radio prize for the first novel, I was due to receive it in Malmö, and for it I had to give an interview, and Dagsrevyen had asked if they could tag along. Thinking I had to do an interview anyway, I'd felt it didn't matter. When I was there, sitting on a chair with a camera trained on my face, it was as though the fear of everything I knew had happened but hadn't actually understood was gathered here, in this one place.

After the interview I lay in bed so frightened that I could hardly move, and I called Linda as soon as I heard her come home.

"Linda! Linda! Linda!" I shouted.

She came in, stopped at the doorway, and looked at me.

"You'll have to look after the children today," I said. "For the rest of the evening. I can't. I have to stay in bed."

She nodded.

"That's not a problem," she said.

I could see she was happy to be able to help me. After she had gone to get the children I sat up, switched on my laptop, which was finally online, and lay all evening watching a series of documentaries about the Second World War. The pictures were unique, many everyday shots of how the world's solidity and fortitude shone through the ravages of war, which made it real in a very different way. When Linda came to bed, I was asleep.

At Easter we traveled to Stockholm, rented a suite in a hotel, I had earned enough money for that, and the idea was I would make a start on Book 6 while Linda and the children visited her mother and spent time with her in various places such as the Junibacken Children's Museum, the Skansen Open-Air Museum, and the Children's Room at the Kulturhus. However, nothing went according to plan, Linda was down and couldn't manage, she called after a few hours and asked if I could take over, and I did. One day Helena and Fredrik invited us to his beautiful house. We caught the train to Uppsala, where he picked us up. Geir and Christina were also there, and after we had been shown around we sat and talked while the children were outside playing. Linda was on a high, so much so that I could hardly communicate properly with her, she was just floating, everything was fantastic. I knew that in reality she was depressed, and I was angry, I hated it when she was like this, so exaggeratedly happy, enthusiastic, and full of praise for everyone although she didn't feel it deep down. There was something false about it. I noticed the difference so easily, others didn't, they just thought she was wonderful. And she really was when she was in this state, the life and soul of every party, just not for me.

When we arrived back in Malmö I continued working on Book 6. So far I was no more than twenty pages in, but it wasn't going to take long anyway, and the plan was to finish it in six weeks. Geir's book had been turned down, it was too long and wordy for Spartacus to take the risk, Molven wrote. Now two large and two small publishing houses had said no, and we had to think in new ways. Geir had always said it would be like this, it was his experience of the world, while I kept saying it would be fine, that was my experience. How a book that was of international standing and radically different from other documentary accounts that had come out in Norway would not be published was beyond me. Moby-Dick wasn't turned down because it was too long and wordy. Or too immoral?

I called Yngve and asked him if he would like to start up a publishing house, e-mailed Asbjørn with the same question, both were enthusiastic about the idea, and so we founded Pelikanen, primarily to publish Baghdad Indigo but also with the idea of continuing afterward, translating books we liked and publishing them.

At this time I started sending the manuscript to those I had written about in Book 5. It was about the twelve years I'd spent in Bergen. The central figure was Tonje. I sat for a long time over an e-mail to her before I sent it.

> When I sent you the first book to read, you wrote that it was a good portrait and you knew it might change later in the narrative; however, you gave me a free hand. That was then, afterward all that happened has happened – including Book 2, which you didn't get to read in advance – and now everything looks very different. What you once agreed to has developed into something else. I was thinking about that when I wrote Book 5, that is why I hardly go into who you are (to me) as a person, and almost exclusively describe you through the eyes of the lover. You have no reason to be ashamed of or to fear what I have written about you in the book, the only mistake (and it wasn't a mistake) you made was to get together with me. What you can fear is of course the newspapers and what they write. The headline "Knausgaard Suspected of Rape" is bound to appear. Naturally it's terrible for you to be associated with this. On the other hand, the book puts all the blame on me, nothing on you, every reader will understand that. If you like I can change the scene when you return from Kristiansand, remove the infidelity, and instead simply have you say it's over.

Not long afterward I received an e-mail from Jan Vidar, he was going to Copenhagen with his family, could they drop in? Of course, I wrote back, it would be nice to see you after all these years. I spent all day cleaning up the flat, going shopping, and cooking. They came in the late afternoon, Jan Vidar, Ellen, and their three children. I had only seen the oldest two when they were tiny tots, now they were big girls.

Linda wasn't well and wasn't feeling up to meeting anyone she didn't know, so she went to the bedroom as soon as she had welcomed them. I suspected Jan Vidar interpreted that as a rejection, that really she didn't want them to be there.

We chatted all evening. He hadn't changed an iota, he was as calm and relaxed as ever. We worked through everyone we had known in those days.

Jan Vidar still lived in town and was in touch with many of them. We also talked about the books I had written, mostly about the hoo-ha around them. Jan Vidar told me he had refused all interviews up to a certain point, then as the attacks on me had increased and accusations of immorality were raining down, he gave up his resistance and defended me. I knew that, my mother had mentioned it, and I said I was pleased he had.

If there was anyone I had needed when I moved into the area as a thirteen-year-old it was him, I thought as we sat in one living room, while all the children were on the sofa watching a movie in the other. Loyal, incorruptible, considerate, independent. He had stayed, I had left. He had learned to play the guitar, I hadn't. He had three children, I had three children. The differences between us at that time had been minor, for when you are in your early teens age is decisive, the world that seems to be forming before your eyes is the same. Jan Vidar was the first person I got drunk with. He was the first person I went to parties with. He was the first person I experienced girls with. Predominantly talking about them because almost everything revolved around music and girls, but also cycling over to see them, each of us on a sofa, making out with a girl to the sound of "Telegraph Road" by Dire Straits, which was made for the purpose.

Now the small differences that existed had become bigger, but he was still the same person he had always been; the differences were in the layers of experience that time had deposited.

Jan Vidar said one thing that evening that I turned over in my mind after they had gone. It was about what my father had been for him. Jan Vidar and I were the best of friends, and for the first three years I lived there Dad had been around as well. While Jan Vidar's father became an important person in my life, always interested and present when I was at their house, Dad was nothing to Jan Vidar, a kind of shadow he knew existed and occasionally saw but with whom he never exchanged a word. He talked about a time I had just got off my bike and Dad came storming out of the house and gave me an earful for something or other. He realized he was strict and suspected I was afraid of him, but actually he knew nothing. We never talked about it. And that was odd to hear. Why did I never talk about Dad in those three years? Normally we talked about everything. Perhaps it was because there was nothing to say. That was how it was. Perhaps because there was no language to express it? I don't recall thinking about him either. I just think I reacted to him, kept him at bay, dealt with what he said and did out of a sense that everything he stood for and did was unchangeable, a bit like a power I lived under. And probably I was ashamed. That must have been why I never spoke to Jan Vidar about him. We were in our early teens, which is the age when it begins to dawn on you that there are other ways of doing things and other ways of thinking than those in your family.

At any rate I wasn't ashamed of Dad, but of the way I was. I can't remember that much about him during those years. His presence in my childhood is clear, then from thirteen until I was sixteen he is vague and indistinct, hardly there at all, he reappears full of vigor and gravitas when I was sixteen and he and Mom divorced.

In those three years he spent most of his time in the living room on the ground floor of the barn while Mom and I were in the house, and when he came in I invariably went up to my room.

No friends. No social life. Only his job, evenings at home. The occasional trip to his parents in Kristiansand over the weekend.

When we moved there he was thirty-eight. He must have felt he was a prisoner in his own life. And he must have been lonely. When I think of him, he is like a kind of shadow.

The autumn the first volume of this novel came out I received a letter from a man in Bodø who had once known my father. He didn't write much, he was more interested in writing about his own life and what the novel meant to him. When, a few weeks later, I was signing books in a shop in Oslo another man came up to me and said he had worked with Dad, and Dad had been an outstanding teacher. Then, not long before Jan Vidar and his family visited us, I got another letter from someone who had known Dad as a young man. He wrote that after reading the first four volumes he wondered how much of Dad's upbringing had affected his relationship with Yngve and me. He wrote that he had lost contact with Dad after gymnas as he'd moved to Bergen, where he has lived ever since, and Dad had moved to Oslo. He wrote that Dad's life had been full of bluff and lies when he had known him, and what I had written about this side of him was nothing in comparison to what he had seen. He wrote that Dad's father had been quick-tempered and moody, and ruled his son with an iron rod, often boxing his ears and not letting him go out. He also wrote about one incident when Dad had been beaten up by some kids his age and left lying on the ground, bleeding and with a split lip.

Reading that, I thought he had never had a chance. Something had been broken inside him at a very young age.

This is a dangerous notion because no one apart from ourselves has responsibility for what we do, we are humans, not creatures subject to forces that drive us here and there without offering any resistance. Unless of course being under the sway of others is part of the human condition, and being a good person is the same as being a lucky person.

My father died in a chair in his mother's house. The house was full of bottles, there was excrement on the sofa, his nose was broken and his face covered with blood. He was in the chair, dead, had been for more than a day, and during that time his mother was in the house. No one knows what she was doing. No one knows how Dad broke his nose or his face got covered with blood. But I do know for certain now that was what happened and what it looked like. If there should be a lawsuit on the basis of My Struggle, as my uncle Gunnar has suggested many times there will be, I have a document as proof. When I received it I was furious. I don't think I have ever been so furious. I had written about how Dad died, and then Gunnar said I was lying. What did that make me, lying about my father's death? How could he say I was lying about the circumstances surrounding Dad's death to journalists, to the publisher, and to everyone in my family, when I wasn't?

I called Kristiansand and asked them to send me a printout of Dad's medical records. Which they did. From the records it was clear that he had lived with his mother for a year and five months before he died. It wasn't quite two years, but it was a long, long way from the two months Gunnar had claimed Dad stayed there. How could he say Dad stayed there for only two months and that I was lying? And how could the Bergens Tidende journalist say that?

I had described what I had seen. After Gunnar's e-mail I had begun to doubt what I had seen. Now I was sure I had seen what I had seen. And that before we arrived Dad had been dead in the chair and Grandma had walked around him, he was dead, he was covered in blood, the place was full of bottles, and it had been like that for a considerable time. Then the ambulance came.

Who called it?

I called Kristiansand again and asked if such conversations were logged. They were, but the person I was speaking to didn't know how long they were kept, he would check it out, he said, and then contact me, but I never heard from him and assumed there was nothing.

Where did the blood come from? Had he fallen and then struggled up, sat down in the chair and died? That might have killed him, the bleeding from the nose, because he had an enlarged heart, which was the only detail I remembered from the autopsy. The undertaker had said the death was alcohol-related.

How could anyone say everything had been in order?

I was furious. Also because I knew I would never find out how he died. Grandma had given a variety of answers. In one she was sitting beside him and discovered that he was dead, we asked her if it was light or dark outside, she couldn't remember. In another she had fallen asleep and woken up and seen that he was dead.

But there wasn't just blood on his face, his nose was also broken, and how had he done that? There wasn't any blood anywhere in the room, I knew that, I had cleaned there, no matter what Gunnar maintained. Could he have gone outside, got into a fight, crawled home, and then died in the chair from the effort? Or did he fall indoors and hit his nose on the floor or perhaps the fireplace? That was most likely. But the blood? Grandma wouldn't have been able to clean it up, that's for certain.

I called Yngve and we talked. He said he could barely remember anything from those days. He couldn't even remember calling the doctor, which I had said he did. Could it have been me who called? I had no memory of it, I thought he had done it, but I wasn't sure. I mentioned the blood that wasn't there. Wasn't there any blood on the carpet? he said. Was there some? I said. No, I would have remembered that. No, there wasn't. I'm sure. Because the first time I realized there was some blood was when the undertaker warned us before we saw the body. Didn't he say something? Yngve asked. Didn't he just say his nose was broken? No, no, I'll never forget, it came as a shock, he warned us, there had been a lot of blood.

Yngve said he'd found another document among Dad's possessions, he had mentioned it earlier, but I'd forgotten. He went to get it from the cellar and called back. It was after a visit to the doctor. Dad had an incredibly high blood-alcohol concentration, and the doctor who had written this doubted everything Dad said, even that he was a gymnas teacher. There wasn't very much of the teacher about him. But he kept lying, it was typical of him to say he was about to start a job as an educational consultant.

What kind of death had he suffered?

When we were in Kristiansand and encountered the dreadful sight I immediately accepted it, that was how it was, but reading this document now, there was no longer anything to accept, I saw it from a distance, him, Dad, dead in the chair, broken nose, bloody face, surrounded by bottles, Grandma walking around. But he is her son. Her eldest son. Her beloved eldest son. Now he is dead, and he's been dead for a while, and she was with him, her dead son, she was walking around him. Is she making coffee? She had done that thousands of times. I knew exactly how she did it, I can visualize all her movements, and she, Grandma, who filled my chest with happiness whenever she paid us an unexpected visit and I smelled her perfume down in the hall, is pouring coffee into a cup and lighting a cigarette. Menthol, that was what she smoked, definitely.

Gunnar didn't want this story to be told. I can understand that. But I can't understand him saying I lied. Saying I had made it all up to avenge my mother, whom my father had left fifteen years earlier. I was so happy when they got divorced. I was so happy to get rid of him. I hated him, and I feared him, and I loved him.

That was how it was.

Now I had written a novel about him. It wasn't a good novel, but then he hadn't lived a good life either. It was his life, it ended in a chair in a house in Kristiansand because he had reached a point where he had given up all hope. There wasn't any hope. Everything was destroyed. So he died.

We could have traveled down to Kristiansand, forced him to go into a clinic, if it was possible, or somehow have got him out of the house. We didn't. I don't regret that. That was how he wanted it, and he was our father. I am his son. The story about him, Kai Åge Knausgaard, is the story about me, Karl Ove Knausgaard. I have told it. I have exaggerated, I have embellished, I have omitted, and there is a lot I haven't understood. But it isn't him I have described; it is my image of him. It's finished now.

In the days before May 17, Constitution Day, the school was closed for several days, and to give myself some writing time, as I had a deadline hanging over me, I went with Heidi and John to Voss while Linda took Vanja to Oslo to visit Axel and Linn. The idea was that Yngve and his children would look after mine and I would be able to work. After that I would go on a short trip to Iceland and be interviewed at Nordens Hus, and then I would go to our cabin and finish the novel there. Mom and Ingrid would help at home while I was away and then it would all be over.

It didn't happen like that.

We had been at Yngve's for only a few hours when Linda rang. I was in the living room with John and Heidi running around me, chased by Ylva, when my phone began vibrating in my jacket pocket.

"Hi, it's me," she said.

"Hi," I said. "Have you arrived?"

"Yes, but guess what. I have some good news."

"What?"

"My book's been accepted."

"Really?"

"Yes! The phone rang just before we left. It was Modernista. The editor there. He said it was fantastic. He hadn't even finished reading before he called."

"How wonderful!" I said, gazing at the scenery outside the window, which at first fell away steeply to the water below, then rose up the mountain to the peaks on the opposite side. "Congratulations! That's exactly what you needed. Now you can really relax. About work, I mean. Now you're a writer again."

"Yes. I'm so happy."

"And when will it come out?"

"Next year. It takes a bit longer in Sweden. But I'll believe it when I see it. Do you remember when Bonniers withdrew their acceptance of my previous book?"

"That won't happen again. Relax. It's fantastic news, Linda."

John stood below me and looked up. I lowered the phone.

"I'm talking to Mommy," I said. "Would you like to say hi too?"

He nodded, I passed him the phone, he put it to his ear. I could hear her excited voice, saw him nodding to everything she said. Then he passed me back the phone.

"We'll have to celebrate when we're back home," I said.

"Yes," she said. "We must."

"Great. I kept telling you how good your writing was."

"You did, but we're married."

"So it doesn't count?"

"Yes, of course it does. But you should've heard how enthusiastic he was."

The first of Linda's short stories I read was called "Universe," I had told her to send it to Vagant. This was several years before we got together. It had language and a suggestive power that went straight to your heart, something that was both naked and robust, helpless and supreme, beneath a bitterly cold winter sky. It was about the best thing I had read for many years, and when I noticed how happy she was when I said that I realized she had no idea how gifted she was. During the weeks when we became a couple she wrote a little essay about the Swedish poet Erik Axel Karlfeldt, and I thought this was the world she moved in. But it wasn't, the essay was an exception, she had barely come into contact with literary theory and she was ashamed of that. But that was precisely what was so good, her writing was her, and what she found inside herself possessed a different form of complexity from that which emerged when a writer was striving for it, as happens when you want the text to be something particular. Her problem was that she wrote very little and lacked confidence. Her writing came in bursts, a few hours of light, then it was gone.

An event from another world: we live in Regeringsgatan in Stockholm, we have one child, she is only a few months old and is asleep between us in bed. I read aloud to Linda from a book Yngve and I were given by my mother's parents when we were small, Asbjørnsen and Moe's collected fairy tales. I read "Valemon, the Polar Bear King." I love fairy tales, the darkness in the best of them, and Linda loves them too. Afterwards we talk about it. Linda is particularly taken by the metal claws the girl is given to climb the rock face. A few days later she starts writing. She invests the whole of her being into this girl who wants and gets the bear. What she writes about belongs to what we cannot discuss, it's impossible, but it's still there, somewhere between us. It makes me think about what is actual, what is real, how dependent we are on language and form for it to exist. That which does not have language or form does not exist, even if it is there. And that was the problem for Linda and me, that what was there between us but didn't exist, grew weaker and weaker, more and more indistinct and nebulous, as the inexpressible dimension between us weakened.

So much in life is unspoken.

Linda called again that evening. She was still happy, it was as though the happiness was a wave washing through her. Everything was fantastic. Vanja, Axel and Linn, Oslo, May 17, Independence Day. I had a warning on the tip of my tongue, I wanted to tell her to take it easy, but I didn't have the heart, of course she should be allowed to be happy.

In Voss I didn't get much work done, Heidi and John wouldn't let me sit in the loft writing, at least not for long periods at a time. I had a whole day to myself when Yngve and his girlfriend, Tone, took all the kids to her mountain cabin, but that was it. In the house below Yngve's lived Espen, it was strange, this was how we had lived so many years ago in Bergen, him below and me above, and when I saw him in the garden I shouted to him and he came up for a cup of coffee and a long chat. He'd spent the last years writing a tome about dissection. We shared a fascination with the baroque and the physical, but our attitudes to it diverged: Espen was more rational; I was more irrational. He was a poet; I was a prose writer. Perhaps what was open in him was closed in me, and vice versa. Nevertheless we had been friends for twenty years, that was what mattered most. In the evening he came over with a bottle of red wine, we sat with Yngve and drank and listened to music from the eighties. The next morning I felt so sick I couldn't get out of bed. I threw up out of the children's sight, told them I had the flu, was unable to get up until late afternoon, when I took them to a shopping mall and bought some May 17 clothes. They didn't know what Constitution Day was but were happy anyway, they had a sense that it was an important day. At home Heidi got a splinter the size of a forefinger in her foot. She screamed so loudly it must have been heard all over Voss. She was afraid of everything that stirred in nature and everything to do with blood and pain, though felt perfectly at home in the social world. There was no question of my removing the splinter, she howled at the mere mention of it. But Ylva, whom she looked up to, was finally allowed to take it out, by the following day there was already a story Heidi could tell, on par with the time she was pushed through the airport in a wheelchair.

On May 17 we stood in the rain in Vossevangen watching the procession, Heidi and John with a Norwegian flag in one hand and an ice-cream cone in the other. I had written only a couple of pages, about Hermann Broch, of what looked like was going to become an essay. Tonje, who lived in Bergen, turned up one day with a tape recorder, she was going to make a documentary about being a character in my books, she asked if I would mind answering a few questions and I couldn't refuse. She had replied to my e-mail about Book 5 a few weeks earlier and said she didn't want anything deleted. I answered all her questions and read out some passages from the novels. She left, we stayed there a few more days, and then we flew to Malmö. A couple of hours after we arrived home the handle on the door started moving up and down and I realized that it was Vanja trying to open it.

"Here they are!" I called out. Heidi and John sprang to their feet in the living room and ran into the hall as the door opened and Vanja and Linda appeared. Vanja was full of her experiences she wanted to tell us about, but also how much she had missed her brother and sister, they had never been apart for so long.

"Hi," I said to Linda. "How was the journey?"

"It was fine," she said. "But I'm a bit tired."

"Have a rest, then," I said.

She nodded.

"But first we need to eat something. Do we have anything here?"

I shook my head.

"Shall we get Chinese takeaway?"

"Yes."

I took the elevator down, bought five boxes, brought them back up, placed the contents on five plates, called the children, who didn't come, so Linda and I sat eating at the table alone.

She was on her way down. The joy had gone, her energy had gone, she ate facing me, quiet. But, I reasoned, she might be tired after the traveling and the week away.

"I did hardly any writing up there," I said. "So I'll really have to go for it over the next few weeks. That's all right, isn't it?"

She nodded.

"At least when Mom and Sissel come," she said. "But that's after you go to Iceland, isn't it?"

"Yes," I said, looking at her.

"Do you have to go? Couldn't you cancel it?"

"Are you crazy? I can't do that. And it's only one day. One day, Linda."

"OK," she said.

"If I can just get down to writing now, over the next few weeks, I'll be done for good. Then I'll have all the time in the world. I just need to stick at it. Then it's over."

"Yes," she said.

Before leaving for Iceland I had to sort out the details around the cabin, so I rented a car and drove there one morning at the end of May. Initially I sat down on the doorstep, smoked a cigarette, and studied the mess. The first job I had to do was to remove the pile of planks, drywall, pipes, and all the other scrap from the old bathroom. The car I'd rented was a Mercedes, it was brand new, and I covered the bottom of the large boot with garbage bags before loading up with trash and driving to the dump several kilometers away. It took six trips to clear the pile.

I took another smoke break on the step.

The lawn which only two years before had been flawless was now riddled with weeds. There was no longer any separation between bed and lawn. Moss grew beneath the tall hedges, and elsewhere, the soil was like an open wound. The white wall of the cabin had a dark coating, several of the wooden boards were rotten at the bottom. The paint had peeled off the window frames. One pane was cracked. The pile of building materials and junk was gone, but the soil and sand the workmen had dug up when they were laying new pipes formed enormous bumps in the grass. By the hedge there were still two buckets of shit from the outhouse days, and it had definitely ripened in the last year. I had to empty them today. And the boxes of apples in the cellar, which I'd optimistically stored two years before, had to be disposed of.

The grass had to be cut.

The hole had to be filled.

The heap of rotting garden waste had to be removed.

That would make a difference at least.

I flicked my cigarette into the hole and opened the door to the small shed where the lawn mower was kept. Took the coiled cord, put one end in the socket, the other in the mower, lifted it out, and started it.

It was Linda who had been behind the purchase of the cabin. During one of her sleepless energy-charged nights she had come across the advertisement online. The cabin had been built at the beginning of the twentieth century, it was really beautiful, a bit Swiss in style, while the garden was large and trim, with two old apple trees, rosebushes, a myriad of flower beds and massive, two-meter-high hedges around three sides. Linda had been saying for a while that we should have one; a couple at the nursery school had one, they went there every weekend of the spring and autumn, grew their own vegetables and berries, and spent large parts of the summer there. With three children and an apartment in the center of town, we had to take them for a walk in the park as if they were dogs, we absolutely should have a cabin in the country.

I should have loved her for that because she was dreaming about our family when she was talking about it. About a happy life, hanging up the washing as the children played around her on a summer afternoon. About a woman's hands covered with soil, about children who had their own little vegetable patches, who had their own paddling pool, and about her husband who cut the grass with a push lawn mower in the evening. Somewhere in the open, our own plot, our own little house, that was what she dreamed about. I should have loved her for it, but I didn't, I was just annoyed.

She showed it to me in the morning. Sitting on the chair in front of the computer clicking on the photos. I leaned over her.

"Isn't it great?" she said. "So beautiful. Almost like a doll's house. But there are two floors. There are bedrooms upstairs. The inside has recently been done up."

She turned to me.

"What do you think?"

"Well, it looks nice," I said. "But we don't have any money. Have you considered that?"

"I can get some. I will get some."

"How are you going to do that?"

"I just will. I want that place."

"It's a lot of work though. I don't have any time. Out of the question."

"I do. I can look after it. You won't need to do anything."

"And if we could get hold of that much money," I said, "we should buy a car. We certainly need one."

"We don't need a car in town. And definitely not if we have a cabin."

"I can't talk you out of it, I can see. And it is nice. But, as I said, we have no money."

"Can't we go out and take a look at it at least?"

"Fine by me."

There followed a few days of hectic activity on Linda's part. She made an appointment at the bank, but that led nowhere since neither Linda nor I were credit worthy, that is, once we hadn't paid some bill or other and had ended up on a list that made it impossible for us to get a loan or a cell phone contract or to rent a car, except for with Europcar, who didn't check the list and whom I therefore used whenever we needed one.

It was humiliating to sit there in the bank, feeling as if I were a criminal with a record, while the lady wearing a pantsuit, blouse, and gold jewelery had no intention of giving us a loan. Linda called her father, who not so long ago had sold his place and was happy to contribute with a hundred thousand kronor as he had never given her anything before. I called my mother, she could take out another mortgage on her house, she said, checked, and called back the next day: she could lend us a hundred and twenty thousand.

So we were a hundred thousand short.

A hundred thousand!

Where were we going to get that from?

I received a monthly stipend of fifteen thousand. On top of which I read manuscripts for a publishing house, who paid ten thousand a month. That made twenty-five thousand, which was seventeen thousand after tax. Although that was a lot of money, it stretched just far enough to cover the rent for the apartment – ten thousand – and there were five of us in the family. If there was a crisis I could call the publishing house. I had no idea how much I owed them, I only knew that it was a lot because at various times I'd received a fixed monthly advance. But I didn't dare ask about my debt. It had been three years since my previous novel came out, and I was still nowhere near a new one. I closed my eyes to anything related to money and the future. By and large this approach worked, that was the main thing.

But a hundred thousand!

"Asking won't hurt anyway," Linda said. "The worst that can happen is they say no."

"OK," I said, and e-mailed Geir Gulliksen.

We want to buy a cabin, I wrote, the idea being that I'll be able to work there, however we are a hundred thousand Swedish kronor short. I know I have had a large advance already, and I won't be upset if you say no. But please consider it.

Geir sent the inquiry to his boss, Geir Berdahl, who called me the following day to ask what kind of place this was. I explained. He said I could borrow ninety thousand Norwegian kroner. Would that be all right? Oh yes, thank you very much, I said. That's too much. Thank you again.

After I hung up, I was racked with guilt. The publishers were putting themselves out so much for me, they always had, and I was exploiting the situation, bringing family matters into the financial arrangements, allowing them to go out on a limb to help me buy a country cabin, which I didn't even want.

Now I would have to work there. That was for sure. I would have to write a lot there.

Linda was happy. We went to see the cabin, a woman in her midfifties met us, she had decorated inside the cabin with great taste, everywhere there were tiny maritime features, wooden sculptures of gulls and lighthouses, mobiles of seabirds, little ornamental cases of shells, balls of green yarn, and fishing nets. The furniture was simple and old, a nice couch with a lovely dresser, both painted blue and white, and two white wicker chairs, plus a dining table with chairs. It felt as if we were in a cabin on one of the skerries and not in the middle of an enormous subdivided community outside the third-biggest town in Sweden.

The girls loved it. After a few minutes hidden behind Linda's legs they thawed and ran around the garden. The owner said she had put so much work into the cabin and the garden, and she liked it so much she didn't really want to sell it. No, selling it was the last thing she wanted to do. But she was moving to another town and couldn't keep it any longer. She said she was pleased we had children, knowing that there would be children playing in her garden was a comfort.

She wanted 290,000 kronor for it. When we got home, we called her and offered 320,000. There were other people interested and I thought it was best to frighten them off right away to avoid a bidding war. She called back the same evening and accepted the offer.

And that was how we became cabin owners.

Linda pictured herself in a straw hat walking around the garden tweaking the flowers, I suspected, perhaps lying in a hammock in the shade and reading, the children around her, barefoot and happy, and on autumn evenings pulling up the carrots, almost colorless in the falling dusk, a pot of vegetable soup on the stove in the little kitchen. The children's excited voices and red cheeks before they fell asleep on the little mezzanine floor while she and I sat in the little living room with a glass of red wine. It wasn't like that, reality was bearing down on us like a juggernaut, all our dreams were crushed, we were arguing, the children were defiant, the garden was dug up to lay pipes and no one filled in the holes, so there were piles of soil and sand everywhere, and where there weren't any it was overgrown. The woman who'd sold it to us came back a few years later to say hello, and when she saw the state the garden was in her eyes had welled up, we were told. The neighbors scowled at us, the amount of work that had to be done increased to such an extent that we began to keep our distance because I'd been against the purchase from the beginning and made it a condition that I'd have nothing to do with it, Linda had to take care of it. She couldn't, it was beyond her now, and so there we were, with our shame and guilty consciences, her with a dream in tatters as well. Even the dream of barefoot children and a carefree life in the open air requires work.

On this afternoon in May 2010, as I pushed the mower down one side of the lawn, if indeed what I was cutting merited such an exalted term, we'd had the place for two and a half years, and nothing had gone as planned. It turned out to be difficult to have three such small children there. The staircase to the second floor was so steep that we constantly had to keep watch to make sure they didn't crawl up, and if we closed the door to be outside, one of us had to occupy John while the other kept an eye on the girls, so there was no question of relaxing, which despite everything we were able to do at home, where they had their rooms and toys and knew how to occupy themselves. Then I was always overcome by an immense feeling of claustrophobia there; I didn't like having people around me on all sides. In town I had no problem with other people, they had nothing to do with me, I had nothing to do with them. In town we were strangers to one another, here we were neighbors, we were supposed to greet one another and exchange a few words when we met, and it was impossible to do anything without being seen. To be seen as a random stranger was quite different from being seen as a particular individual, a stern forty-year-old father, and I couldn't bear that look, it made my brain boil, made it impossible for me to relax, I saw myself all the time, and if the children shouted, or cried and started fighting, it wasn't the shouts, the tears, or the fights I reacted to but being seen by others. I had internalized these other people, and I hated it. Oh, how I hated it. My head churned, I saw myself and I saw myself seeing my children, and nothing was as it was, everything was tied in knots, I was the most unfree person in the world. And I had voluntarily locked myself in here! On the other hand, it was a dream, Linda's dream, I owed it to her to live it out.

Up at six one spring morning, it is damn cold outside, the grass is wet, and there is nothing to do inside the doll's house, except wait for the hours to drag by until ten, then we can go to the shops and afterward maybe make some lunch.

If only the sea had been nearby! Or a forest. Some open expanse.

During the summer we were informed that sewage pipes were going to be laid for all the cabins. It would cost twenty thousand kronor. In the fall the whole garden was dug up and a pipe laid to the outside toilet, a small room with its own door. We had to get ahold of a plumber who could build a new toilet there and, somehow, find the money for this and the excavations. It definitely wouldn't come in at under forty thousand. Linda borrowed the money from the bank, her mother was our guarantor. The fence was taken down and the front garden dug up, in addition the lack of maintenance had already begun to have consequences. It wasn't my responsibility, I had been absolutely unambiguous in that respect: if we buy a cabin it is your responsibility, you are the one who will have to take care of it, I haven't got the time, I'd said, and because I'd said it, I wasn't going to go back on my word – except to cut the grass. As the neglect slowly spread I gloated, this was her responsibility and hers alone. I had washed my hands of the matter. No one could say I hadn't warned her! Or that I hadn't predicted it would turn out like this.

Linda's mother, who at this time was staying with us for long stretches, managed to turn up a gardener from the Balkans, who leveled the lawn and sowed new grass, and a plumber from North Africa, who was able to do the pipe job for a song, relatively speaking. How she found them I have no idea, but she was the kind who chatted to everyone, such as our neighbors, in a few days she knew them better than I did and I'd been there for more than two years. So by the spring the garden looked nice again, and we had a bathroom with a shower. I didn't care that when I turned on the hot-water boiler the shower wouldn't stop or that the pipes weren't discreetly tucked away alongside the wall, but stood out in all their chrome-metal glory and in places resembled the cryptic instruments in a Cronenberg film. We just had to accept it, we couldn't look after the place, we couldn't live out that dream, it wasn't for us. When would I ever sow carrots with the children? When would I ever weed the beds? The claustrophobia began to throb in me the moment we got into the bus to go there. We went there less and less, and in May 2010, when I was cutting the grass with the red cord wrapped around my shoulder, under a dry, gray sky, we hadn't been there since the previous autumn, and even then only sporadically, a few hours one sunny day perhaps, because it was a vicious circle: the more neglected it became, the less time we wanted to spend there, and the less time we were there the more neglected it became.

I felt an ache in my heart. We had failed.

As a family we had failed.

Or had we? Why not view the matter with a practical eye? We made a misjudgment, we bought a place we didn't have the time to keep in order, and when we realized that we put it up for sale. Why should that cause my heart to ache?

The heart cannot reason. The brain does that. And if there was one thing I had learned in life, it was that the heart is everything, the brain nothing.

That was why everything in life was always so horribly painful.

I stopped the mower and walked over to move the bench, the table, and the chairs, which were half under an apple tree. They appeared to be made of wood, but it was some synthetic material and completely weatherproof. Having done that, I restarted the mower, pushed it slowly across the uneven, undulating soft ground, which was so suffocated by moss that the blades mostly whirred over thin air. Only by the hedge, beside the overgrown flagstones, did they engage again.

The problem with people is that they are too sensitive. Almost everyone I knew or met or saw was too sensitive. Something had happened to them once and they hadn't got over it. If your father had lost his temper with you when you were a child and perhaps hit you, what does it matter now? If other kids locked you in the uniform closet in the gym, what has that to do with your present life? If you were a terrible bed wetter, a wussy little shit or your mother drank or your father took his own life, or if your parents totally ignored you, you aren't them, you are your own person and you have your own time, which is now, so why on earth do you let the past have any influence on it? Why should what your parents did weigh so heavily on your life? Why didn't we leave it at that?

What good would all these feelings and musings do?

I saw it in my own children, how small things could grow to enormous proportions in them. At first they were like animals in the sense that their feelings were closely connected with the moment, from which tears or laughter or fear or well-being resulted, and the very next it was forgotten. Then they became human, that was when things lasted and expanded. Recently, for example, Vanja had started worrying that she couldn't say her r's. When she was smaller it didn't matter, she said j instead, so when she had to say "trädet" for instance, she said "tjädet" or "tjolleji" instead of "trolleri," and even if it brought an occasional stab to the heart, because I hadn't been able to say my 'r's when I was small, and I remembered the hell it had been, mostly I didn't think about it, it was part of Vanja, and everyone understood what she meant to say. Then she became aware of it. Dad, I can't say j, she said to me, looking up on our way to the school. Why can't I say j, Dad? Everyone else can. I answered that everyone had different r's. Katinka, who spoke the Skåne dialect, had one; Mommy had a Stockholm accent and had another. And you have yours.

She was reassured by that, but not for long, now the seed was sown, now it was growing. There was such a thing as correct and such a thing as incorrect, something that was as it was meant to be and something that wasn't. One afternoon when she had been singing a song with all the letters in the alphabet, she paused just before the r, snorted with annoyance and started throwing things around. She went on and on about how she couldn't pronounce r. I could see it was terrible for her, but there was nothing I could do except say hers was good enough. But then Heidi happened to have the world's best rolled r, her tongue flapped against her palate and she pronounced all the words with an articulate felicity. Why can Heidi say it and I can't? Vanja said. She avoided words that started with an r. I remembered I had muttered about moving to England when I was older because they had an r I could pronounce. Not being able to say r had been a huge thing for me, it was as though it labeled me as a person. Now I was seeing it from the outside, and I wished I could communicate to Vanja that I loved her whatever she could or couldn't do, did or didn't do, but of course that was an impossible task, she had to resolve this herself. She had been wearing glasses for some years and had accepted it, now she was asking why so few children wore glasses and if she lost her temper they were always the first thing to go. Bang. Onto the floor with them. In school she was suddenly taken ill, she had a sudden need to sleep, the staff called and said she was sick, we knew better, something must have happened, we picked her up anyway, and at home, lying on the sofa with a blanket over her, watching a cartoon on TV, she let it slip, her best friend hadn't wanted to play with her that morning. Then she got it into her head that she shouldn't eat sugar, and refused sweets although she really wanted them. All the freedom there was in the first four to five years of life, which I had done my best to restrict, had stopped, now there was a new consciousness, and the complexity of relationships grew. I knew that none of this was important in itself, it was all arbitrary, but she didn't, for her this was everything. She was entering a system and didn't know she was.

She was six now. In three months she would be starting at real school. For the first time in my life with her I could remember what it had been like when I was her age. No longer vague or based on single memories, but clear and distinct, all the intensity of the world, which I had drawn down into my lungs with every breath as I ran around Tybakken, where everything, the smallest object and tiniest incident had a meaning all its own and rushed toward me as if seen through a magnifying glass, and where great emotion was invested in all the people I had around me. It felt as if everything was about life and death, life was stretched to the bursting point, and when I fell in love with a girl in my class, it filled me in a way I can no longer understand, least of all when I look at Vanja. Does she feel the world so intensely? I look at her and see a little girl going about her business within the framework we have set, we live here, in a city-center apartment, we send her to a parents' co-op nursery school every day. She draws and plays with the countless little animal and human figures she has; sometimes alone, sometimes with Heidi and John. She climbs trees in the park, she casts longing gazes after any dogs that cross her path. She reads her dog book, she has one of her school friends over or she goes over to their house. She swims at the Badeland complex, she has baths at home, she pushes the cart for me when we go shopping. I react to what she says and does, this is "Vanja," my daughter, whom I have seen almost every day of her life. I know everything looks different to her, inside her other laws apply, her laws, she is a person who sees the world and is filled by strong feelings for it, but hardly ever thinks about it, what it actually means. I am so numbed by all the routines we follow, by the system of coordinates that has been placed on my life, that I unconsciously assume everyone around me feels the same, not least the three small people with whom I share my apartment. Even their almost volcanic emotional outbursts I see in my terms, as irritating disturbances, desperate aberrations, obstacles in the way rather than as signs of distinct life inside them.

In this kind of life, as in everything else, there is probably a sense and a purpose: a life where you constantly relate to and empathize with those of others must be unbearable, and perhaps it is also harmful in the case of children, who need distance from the adult world in order to be able to see it and develop in relation to it. Be that as it may, this doesn't stop me thinking that I empathize too little with the lives of other people. Most conspicuously and persistently with regard to Linda. One of the many things she criticizes me for is that I don't see her. This is not quite true, I do see her, the problem is that I see her more or less in the way you see a room you know well; everything is there, the lamp and the carpet and the bookcase, the sofa and the window and the floor, but somehow transparently, no mark is left on your mind.

Why do I organize my life like this? What do I want with this neutrality? Obviously it is to eliminate as much resistance as possible, to make the days slip past as easily and unobtrusively as possible. But why? Isn't that synonymous with wanting to live as little as possible? With telling life to leave me in peace so that I can . . . yes, well, what? Read? Oh, but come on, what do I read about, if not life? Write? Same thing. I read and write about life. The only thing I don't want life for is to live it.

I put the lawn mower in the shed, which was empty as I'd had to clean it out when the bathroom was being built and I'd never put everything back. I walked over to the hedge and looked at the two buckets of shit. One had a lid, the other didn't, it was covered with a plastic bag. I had considered driving them to the dump, but first of all I was afraid the bucket without the lid might topple over or the contents would spill, because it was filled to the brim, and I suspected that even if the rental company were to allow the transport of bits of wood, drywall, and dust in the Mercedes, they might well feel differently about liquid excrement. And secondly the dump was packed with people from all over the district with their trailers, it was also full of people working there, and what section would shit come under? Garden waste? I could imagine myself carrying the buckets and one of the employees coming up to me and asking me what I was throwing away, because that is what they did, it was important that everything was disposed of in the right place. It wouldn't work. I would have to get rid of it here. The obvious option was to bury it. There was already a big hole where the pipe came in, under the bathroom. If I dug it deeper, I would be able to throw the garden waste in there as well. I had put aside some of the flagstones the plumber had taken up, they would stabilize it, I reasoned, and then I could cover the whole thing with earth.

I started digging. When I figured the hole was deep enough, I tossed branches, bushes, and rotting leaves in. Then came the shit. I grabbed the bucket with the lid first. It was heavy, so I had to use both hands. I breathed through my mouth. The stench when I removed the lid was still so pervasive that it triggered my gag reflex. The contents of the bucket were thin and liquid and dark brown. Agh, damn it. Oh shit. I poured it out, retched again. Fucking hell. I didn't have gloves, and my hands and the bottom of my jeans were spattered with shit. I turned on the hose and rinsed the bucket, washed my hands, put the hose by the edge, still breathing through my mouth, I could feel the nausea rising in my chest. I felt as if I were in an inferno, my brain was on fire, everything was bathed in a flickering light, and the whole time I was frightened someone would come and see what I was doing. But the worst was still to come because I would have to hold the bucket without a lid or handle close to my chest. Which I did, splashing even more shit over myself, but then it was done. The buckets were empty and rinsed, the hole glistened. I went to get more of the garden refuse and threw it on top. I shoveled some earth over, but I'd put in too many branches, they were springy and the earth wasn't heavy enough to keep them down. The stench was unbearable. My head was reeling. I put the flagstones on top, the branches sank under the weight and I covered it all with more earth. The branches were gone and the area was level, none of what lay beneath was visible. But the smell hovered above the ground and was apparent from meters away, and if you stepped onto the filled hole it moved beneath your feet.

I had to hope the stench would dissipate of its own accord and none of the potential buyers coming to the viewing the following day would stand just there.

I left the Mercedes in the multistory parking garage, put the keys through the door flap of the rental company, and walked home through the side streets. With my trousers stained with shit and my clothes filthy from soil and plaster, I wasn't going to risk walking along the pedestrian street, where I occasionally bumped into the few people I knew in Malmö. Sometimes I'd also been stopped by strangers, who wanted to say something about my books and the reflections they'd had. Back home, I went straight into the bathroom, tore off my clothes, put them in the washing machine and switched it on, then ran a bath and got in. Slowly the buzz of hysteria that had circled through my head for the past few hours ebbed away. For perhaps half an hour I lay in the bathtub staring up at the ceiling without thinking of anything specific, as the steam stuck like adhesive tape to the window and mirror, and in my imaginary world the bathroom turned into a tank, a room detached from everything else.

With reddened skin, fingertips crinkled like raisins, I got up, rubbed myself down, wrapped a towel around my waist, and padded into the bedroom, where I rummaged through the heap of clothes until I found a shirt, a pair of jeans, and a pair of matching socks and could finally join the others in the living room, the children on the sofa in front of the TV, Linda lying on the bed by the wall.

"How was it?" she said.

"Fine," I said. "It was a nightmare emptying the buckets of shit. Anyway, at least it's done now."

"Which buckets of shit?"

"At the cabin," I said. "Don't you remember what it was like before we got the toilet?"

"Did you empty them? Where did you do that?"

"Where they're supposed to be emptied," I said. "Have you eaten?"

"Yes," Linda said. "There's some for you in the kitchen."

After eating I began to pack for the trip. It was only one night away, so I didn't need much. But I took my laptop in case there was any time to write on the plane, and the first volume of Hitler's Mein Kampf, which I absolutely had to read before I went to the cabin to finish the novel. At least I had to skim through it so that I knew what it was about.

"Will you put the kids to bed?" Linda said when I'd finished and sat down on the sofa. "I've been with them all day."

"Will you sort out the cabin while I put them to bed? Or what were you thinking?"

She didn't answer, just looked at me for a few seconds. Then she turned to face the wall.

"Of course I will," I said.

"Can we have a bath, Dad?" Vanja said.

"Can you manage it by yourselves?"

"Yes."

"Then you can."

They jumped up and raced off to the bathroom.

"Do you have to go?" Linda said. "I don't know if I can manage with them on my own."

"Of course you can," I said. "It'll be absolutely fine."

"Can't you cancel it?"

I shook my head. I had canceled one trip to Luleå already, this was the second attempt, and to cancel it would have been inconceivable, it would have taken a natural disaster. I had also canceled an appearance at the Literature Festival in Lillehammer, the children were going camping with their classmates and Linda couldn't take them on her own by train and bus, so I had e-mailed the organizers and canceled, the children had been so looking forward to going, it was the high point of this half of the year. But I'd become so well known in the meantime that the cancellation was not received without a murmur as before, no, Mom called to say it was in all the papers and had been an item on the TV news.

"A deal's a deal," I said. "And it's only one day. I'm back the day after tomorrow. This is my job after all. You have to respect that."

In Iceland I hardly dared phone home, I was sure she would moan and say how difficult everything was and how badly things were going. And she did, that is she didn't complain, what she said was that this was no good. This is no good, Karl Ove, she said. This is no good. It has to be, I said. Stick it out.

I returned home late in the afternoon the next day. The children came running over as soon as they heard the door open. I gave them the presents I'd bought at the airport, three cuddly toys. Linda stood at the end of the hall, looking at me. She seemed scared.

I unpacked and put the suitcase on the top shelf of the hall closet. Vanja came over with a ribbon in one hand and scissors in the other.

"Can you make me a necklace?" she said.

"For me too," Heidi said, close behind.

I cut off two long strips, tied one around the neck of Vanja's dog, the other around Heidi's neck.

"With a loop!" Vanja said.

I made a loop at the end for her hand, and did the same for Heidi. Then I went onto the balcony. The children seemed fine at any rate, I thought, things can't have gone that badly. Experience of an event wasn't the same as the event.

Linda opened the door.

"Can't you stay inside?" she said. "I've been on my own with them for so long."

"Coming," I said. "Just finishing a cigarette."

"Will you put them to bed?"

"Of course."

The trip had filled me with energy, so it was no effort brushing their teeth, finding their pajamas, a glass of water, reading a book, and resolving all the little squabbles. Besides, I was looking forward to the following day, when I would be at the cabin writing. It was mostly the thought of being completely alone and working that was appealing; when I did actually sit down and try to start, the resistance I felt was nearly insurmountable.

When at last they were in their beds and had reconciled themselves to the day being over, I went to Linda, who was on the balcony smoking in the darkness, wrapped up in the green parka I had once given her for her birthday.

She said nothing when I sat down. She gazed across the rooftops, one arm tucked into her body as though embracing herself or trying to hold herself in position, the other pointing straight ahead with a cigarette between her fingers curling smoke.

"How are you?" I said.

"Are you still going to the cabin tomorrow?" she asked.

I nodded.

"This is no good," she said. "Don't you understand? I can't manage."

"Listen," I said. "I have three weeks to finish the novel. That's very little time. I can't, by which I mean, I cannot, waste two more days."

"But I'm scared, Karl Ove," she said, looking at me. "I can't be with them on my own. I don't know what might happen. I can't do this. It's dangerous."

"It's just something inside you," I said. "Everything's fine. Everything's as it was before. The darkness is inside you. But we can't run our lives according to that. And I have to write."

"Don't go," she said. "Please. Don't go."

I didn't say anything. I could feel myself getting angry.

After a while, when I looked at her again, I saw tears running down her cheeks.

"Why are you crying?" I said.

"I'm so frightened," she said.

"There's nothing to be frightened of," I said.

"Sometimes when I've been on a high I've been completely out of control. I haven't known where the children were. Vanja was at a friend's house. Heidi at another friend's. John was asleep in bed. They could've been anywhere for all I knew. Do you understand?"

"That was a real high, yes. But everything was OK. Nothing happened. You dealt with it magnificently."

"And all the things I buy."

She sobbed.

"Come on, Linda," I said. "Pull yourself together now. We're adults. We can't stop working because we're sad. I'm going tomorrow, you're here with the children over the weekend, and then Ingrid and Sissel are here next week. You can let them take over. Two days. You can manage that. I have to finish. You'll manage fine with the children. I know you will."

"Not now though," Linda cried. "Not now."

"Yes, you will," I said. "You're strong, it'll be fine. I can deal with everything, so you can too. It's just that you've got it into your head that you can't. You give up. And that's no good."

She looked at me, despair in her eyes.

"You have to," I said. "Because I'm going anyway. And both your mother and mine are coming to help."

"Not tomorrow," she said. "I'll be on my own with them."

"That's true," I said. "And you'll manage fine. You just have to want to. And when I've finished we'll go to Corsica. It'll be great. But first of all I need to finish the novel."

I stubbed out my cigarette and went in. She stayed outside. I pulled out the big suitcase, packed my laptop, the keyboard, the headset, a pile of CDs, a handful of books, and some clothes. While I was doing that I heard the balcony door open and close. Linda stood in front of me.

"Don't leave me alone," she said.

I peered up at her and looked down again, at the zipper I was pulling on the side of the case, holding down the top with one knee.

"I have to," I said. "I have no choice."

She walked past me into the bedroom. I put the case in the hall and sat down on the sofa and zapped through the TV channels for an hour or so. When I went to bed she was still awake, lying perfectly still in bed and staring at the ceiling. I undressed and lay down beside her.

"You'll be fine," I said. "But I can't stay here. I've done it too often. And now I have the deadline hanging over me."

"OK," she said.

"Goodnight."

"Goodnight."

"Sleep well."

"Sleep well."

I woke up once in the night, she was awake, staring at the ceiling, as she had been when I came to bed. I turned over and fell asleep again. The next time I woke it was morning. Linda was looking at me. When our gazes met her mouth opened and closed as if gasping for air. Her eyes were shiny with tears.

"You can't go," she said.

"No, I suppose I can't," I said, and sat up, put my feet into my jeans and pulled them on. "But the moment Ingrid enters the apartment I'm off. Just so that you know."

I closed the door hard behind me and went into the kitchen. Strangely enough, the children were still asleep. I got the newspapers from the front door, put the coffee machine on, and ate two slices of bread as I read the culture pages first, then the sports section. Outside it was raining, cold spring rain, it was pouring down. The children got up in the usual sequence, first John, then Heidi, last of all Vanja.

"Where's Mommy?" she said.

"She's having a rest today," I said. "She's not feeling herself."

"Me too," Vanja said. "I want to rest today too."

"Nonsense," I said. "She needs some peace and quiet. Why don't we watch some TV? OK?"

"OK," she said, and joined the other two. They sat on the sofa watching TV all morning, they did that every Saturday. I closed the door to the hall, where the bedroom was, and told them not to go in. They were used to that, but if I didn't keep my ears pricked they would sneak in. Sometimes I felt like the pastor in Fanny and Alexander, the evil man who keeps the children away from their mother.

At ten we heard the voice of the preacher who stood in the square below every Saturday morning with a microphone in his hand. I opened the balcony door and looked out. The bare Christmas tree lay beside the door, with yellow needles scattered beneath it. All the flowers hanging in boxes under the balustrade were withered, as were those in the pots by the wall. The table and chairs, which had been left outside for three successive winters, were now gray and rotting. Some empty plastic bags, two big and two small deck chairs leaning against the wall, faded. A plant pole had blown down during a winter storm and other bits of debris had collected there.

I decided to clean it up, throw everything away and then buy some new flowers and perhaps a table and a couple of chairs. Partly because it was needed and partly because I wanted to show Linda how easy it was to occupy the children and do something constructive at the same time. The flaw was in her, not the world.

"All right, on with your boots and rain jackets!" I said.

"Why?" Heidi asked.

"Where are we going?" Vanja asked.

Only little John was up for some adventure, and he ran into the hall to wait for me to come and help him.

"We're going to buy some flowers," I said.

"Boring," said Vanja.

"Maybe," I said. "But we're going anyway."

"Is Mommy coming?" Vanja asked.

I shook my head.

"Don't want to go," Heidi said.

"I want to see Mommy," Vanja said.

"Oh, come on, poppets. I'm in charge. And I say, Get your gear on."

"No one is in charge of anyone," Vanja said.

Where did they get that from?

I took the remote and switched off the TV. Their furious little faces glared at me.

"We'll get some Saturday sweets too," I said.

"OK," Vanja said.

"OK," Heidi said.

A quarter of an hour later we were walking down the pedestrian street in the rain, Vanja in her blue rain gear, Heidi in her purple outfit, John sitting in the stroller like a frog in his green coveralls.

Outside the flower shop there was a metal table with two chairs, I was reminded of "wrought iron," a term I was acquainted with only on a literary plane, a bit like "*pock*marked," which I didn't fully understand either. They were meant to have a nineteenth-century feel about them, and were probably a bit kitschy, but I liked them anyway and bought them. I also bought six green plants. I balanced the table on the handle of John's stroller, carried one chair and some bags in each hand, and nudged the stroller forward with first one hand, then the other, while the two girls trudged beside me in their rubber boots. When they realized we were heading for the front entrance of our block, they protested.

"What about the sweets?" Vanja shouted.

"But we can't go into a shop with all this!" I said.

"You should've thought about that before," she said.

"We'll drop it off and then go out again. OK?"

She nodded. I carried the table and the chairs onto the balcony while they waited in the hall, but when I returned they weren't there. Wet footprints led into the bedroom. I followed, they were standing around Linda as she lay looking up at them. She said something, but her voice didn't carry. She seemed barely able to talk.

Her face was expressionless.

"Now you come with me," I said. "Right now."

Vanja and Heidi did as I said, but John fell onto the bed. I grabbed his jacket by the collar, carried him into the hall dangling from my fist and put him down hard in front of the elevator. He laughed and looked up at me.

"Again, Daddy."

I smiled at him.

In the cheap furniture shop down from the florist's I found a white globe ceiling light that would fit the bill, and then we went to the mall in Triangeln, where there was a kiosk with a good selection of candy. After they had picked and mixed I bought them a chocolate bun in the café there while I ordered a coffee for me.

I had never seen Linda like that before. It was as if she were in a deep well and had to use all her strength to come to the surface, where the children were. There had been barely any life in her eyes.

Hmm.

I glanced across at Paparazzi, a little clothes shop which occasionally had nice stuff, Tiger and Boss suits, a Danish label whose name I never remembered, but I had bought some of their scarves and they had a good line of shirts.

"Could you sit here quietly for a moment?"

They nodded.

"I'm just going to that shop."

I got up and walked over. From the window I could see them, legs dangling from their chairs. I looked at the belts, chose a light brown one and flipped through a pile of black jeans, found my size, placed the belt and the jeans on the counter.

"You can try them on if you like," said the assistant, a woman in her fifties.

"I don't have time," I said. "My kids are over there."

When I nodded toward the café I saw John steaming toward me. I hurried out, caught him, and carried him into the shop in my arms.

"Stand here," I said. "I just have to pay."

I put my card in the reader, tapped in the code, she put the receipt in my bag with the trousers and the belt, and passed it to me.

"We have to do some shopping too," I told the girls when we came out.

"But I don't want to," Vanja said.

"I want to go home to Mommy," Heidi said.

"But we've got to, you know that. Come on. You can choose a movie each on the way."

There was a video and music shop at the other end of the mall. They ran over to the children's section as I flipped through some rows of CDs. I bought a Thåström collection, the first Järvinen record, and on a whim a Swedish band called the Radio Dept. and a Swede called Christian Kjellvander. The children came back with their movies, I paid, we crossed the street and went into Hemköp, I bought some pizzas for lunch, and bread, milk, and sandwich fillings for the following day. On our way home we walked – to great protests – via Thomas Tobak, where I bought some newspapers, the Danish Politiken, Weekendavisen, the Swedish Expressen, and Aftonbladet. Back home, they started arguing about which movie they would watch first. I promised them they could watch all three, and said it was fairest to start with Vanja's since she was the eldest. They accepted that. After inserting the DVD I went in to see Linda, who was lying on her side, her head almost completely covered by the duvet.

"How's it going?" I said.

She turned around slowly and looked up at me. Her gaze seemed to come from a great distance.

"Good," she whispered.

"Have you had anything to eat?"

"I . . .," she said, and then came something I didn't catch.

"What was that?"

"I had a bite while you were out," she said.

"So you don't want anything now?"

She gently shook her head.

"The kids . . .," she said.

"What about them?" I said. "They're fine. I bought some films. They're watching them now. And I bought a table and chairs and flowers for the balcony. And a ceiling lamp for the dining room."

She said nothing, just looked at me.

"I'm thinking of cleaning it up. Throwing out lots of the junk. Is that OK? I'll tell the children not to come in here, but they might anyway."

"That's fine," she said.

"OK," I said. "It's pizza for lunch. You'll get up, won't you?"

She nodded slowly.

"Good," I said, closed the door, took my shoes to the balcony door, put them on, and went out. I studied the Christmas tree for a while, wondering whether to carry it down as it was, but I doubted there would be any room in the trash container downstairs, and leaving it beside it wasn't an option either, that was bound to lead to a full investigation. I went back inside, picked up the saw and a black trash bag, cut it up into four parts, and put them in the bag, which I carried down to the cellar. Back on the balcony, I threw all the withered flowers into another trash bag, which I then carried down. When I returned, the sofa was unoccupied. I went straight to Linda's room. She was sitting up in bed, Vanja and Heidi were pulling at her, John was jumping up and down on the mattress, she looked dazed, as though she didn't know what to do, and utterly exhausted.

"What did I say?" I said.

"It's OK," Linda whispered.

"Come on now," I said. "Mommy needs some peace and quiet."

"Are you sick?" Heidi asked. "Do you have a temperature?"

"No, she isn't sick. Just a bit tired," I said. "Aren't you?"

"I can get up for a little now," she said.

"Yeees!" John said.

Linda sat on the edge of the bed fumbling around her.

"What are you looking for?"

"My sweater."

I leaned forward and flipped back the duvet.

"There it is," I said. "Come on, all of you, let's go to the living room. Mommy will be out in a minute."

They did as I said. I stopped in the doorway, looked at her. Her movements were so slow that it didn't seem as if she would be able to put on her sweater.

"You don't have to get up, you know," I said. "It'd be better if you rested."

She looked at me.

"But now you've told them you would," I said.

I went back to the balcony, stood in the gently falling rain surrounded by the sounds of the town seven floors down, picked up everything that was strewn around, dropped it in a garbage bag, and put the new plants in the old pots. When I walked in carrying the bag on my back, Linda was sitting on the sofa with John on her lap. She wasn't looking at the TV screen, I noticed, but staring straight ahead.

"I'll run down with this," I said. "Now it's looking all right out there anyway."

When I came back and sat down in the chair in the other living room to read the papers, I heard her get up, the sound of her footsteps, and the bathroom door opening. So that was where she was going.

A few minutes later it opened again.

I got up and stepped into the hall. She was standing still, looking at me. She was crying.

"I can't do it," she said.

"Go back to bed," I said.

"I'll have to," she said.

"Go on," I said.

I fitted the lamp, not without a fight because the screws were small and my fingers so big and clumsy, I heated the pizzas and made a salad, which we ate in front of the television, all together. Afterwards they were allowed to have some candy and Linda went to bed. I brushed their teeth, they put on their pajamas but didn't want to go to bed without saying goodnight to their mother, so they charged in and Linda sat up to give them a hug. Her eyes, which were focused on the wall, were vacant as she stroked their backs and squeezed them tight.

I sat up for a few hours after the children had gone to sleep, browsing through the papers, watching a bit of TV, smoking on the balcony. Linda was asleep when I entered the bedroom, or at least her eyes were closed, and I lay down gently beside her and fell asleep at once.

The next day was Mother's Day. It was still raining, a steady drizzle over the town's buildings and streets. I took the kids to the playground. The verdant grass shimmered in the gray spring light. The colors of their rain jackets were almost obscenely bright as they walked around the playground equipment. After half an hour I dragged them with me to a furniture shop, where I examined sofas, the one we had was so dirty and worn after five years of children that it could only be used if we covered it with rugs. Then we made our way to Åhléns. I said it was Mother's Day and they could each buy a present for Mommy.

"Could you gift wrap these?" I asked the assistant in Norwegian.

"I beg your pardon?"

"Could you wrap them up?" I said, using a Swedish expression.

"Of course," she said.

The children had chosen a big towel, a pair of socks on which was written "The Best Mommy in the World," and I'd found two CDs for her. John wanted her to have a plane. They watched the girl wrap up the presents, then they headed for the toy department. I paid and was about to take the bag when my phone rang. It was the real estate agent. She had been trying to get in touch with Linda for two days now, she said.

I told her Linda was ill, and that she would have to talk to me from now on. My face felt hot, I was sure she would ask about the stench and why on earth the ground by the wall was springy. But she didn't say anything, just that there had been quite a few people at the viewing, one of them had started criticizing everything he saw and ridiculed the price, no one had made an offer afterwards. There would be another viewing this afternoon and then next weekend. We hung up, I went to find the children. They were happy we were going to give presents to Linda. We had also bought some cinnamon buns and juice.

"Mommy, Mommy, we have some presents for you," they shouted as we came in.

"Hang on," I said. "First we have to fika."

Fika, that was the Swedish word for drinking coffee, an old slang word deriving from kaffi, with the syllables swapped around.

I put the buns in a basket, took out five plates, three glasses, two cups, mixed the juices, put the coffee on, Heidi and Vanja set the table.

"Now you can go and get her," I said.

Slowly she followed them through the hall. Perched on the edge of her chair by the wall. They stood in front of her, each holding a present. They handed them to her, one after the other. She slowly unwrapped them. The towel, the socks with "The Best Mommy in the World" on them. They watched her full of expectation.

"Thank you," she said.

Her face was blank. Not a trace of emotion was visible.

Oh no, oh no.

Oh no, oh no.

"Heidi chose the towel, and Vanja the socks, and John wanted to buy you a plane, but I think it was because he wanted to play with it himself," I said.

"And then we bought some buns and juice. Heidi and Vanja have set the table. Now let's eat. Come on, everyone."

I'd spoken in such a loud voice, and quickly so that there would be so much going on around them that they wouldn't notice something was wrong and think about it.

Linda was crying when we were alone in the bedroom afterwards.

"I can't do anything," she said.

"Well," I said. "That's now. It'll pass."

"I have an appointment with the doctor tomorrow," she said. "Can you come with me, do you think?"

"Of course I can," I said.

"It's awful," she whispered.

"It'll be all right," I said. "Everything'll be fine. You'll soon be better. The kids are fine."

She shook her head.

"Yes, they are. Their grandmothers are coming too."

"You have to write," she whispered.

"That'll sort itself out," I said.

After she made the radio program, Linda had been down for a long time. Then there had been a light patch, suddenly she didn't have a care in the world. It had been good for me as it meant her energy increased and I could have more time for writing. She did a lot of shopping, and if she didn't actually hide it from me, she wasn't very open about it either. Out of the blue there were two horrible large porcelain dogs in the children's room, for example, which she had bought for them, and the windowsill in our bedroom was full of similar ornaments. I knew her grandmother had been like that, presumably they gave her a sense of security. I didn't object to her buying them for herself, but I didn't much like her drawing the children into it. This wasn't her, usually she had good taste, now something else was coming out in her. Once she had seen a young girl begging in front of Hemköp and decided to do something, she called social services and told them about her. This may have been an act of kindness, but it wasn't something Linda would normally have done. If I said to her that she'd done a lot of shopping recently, she would snort, what she bought was so cheap, almost everything was from secondhand shops. One afternoon there was a ring at the door, and there stood an antique-shop owner, she had bought a lamp in the same mawkish, heavy, ancient-aunt style, and not because it was cheap, it wasn't, but because it was so beautiful. She spoke a lot to strangers, people sitting at the next table in a café, shop assistants, and at the nursery school, she was good friends with everyone. She beamed, chatted, and kept everything on a very superficial level. There was nothing wrong with any of this aside from the fact that I never had any real contact with her, and she never had her feet on the ground. When I said that, she looked at me and said she understood what I meant. Of course, she understood everything and everything was fine. She was happy, that was all there was to it, and everything worked, she was creative with the children, and they liked the mood she brought, things happened around her. I put my dislike of this to one side, after all there was nothing wrong with it, and what could I say, that she shouldn't buy such hideous things for the children? Oh, one afternoon the girls each had a used Barbie doll in their hands, and John had a soldier. Had Linda bought them?

I threw the dolls away after the children had gone to bed.

When the light period was over and she began to sink, she was full of shame for what she had done, even though there was nothing wrong with it, not in itself. It worried her a lot that her ups and downs had become worse. Once she attacked me, saying I should help her, every other man would. She wanted me to help her go back into therapy. Most of all she wanted us to go together. She had wanted that for many years. She knew I would rather die than go to couples therapy, and actually I meant it. If there were a choice between couples therapy and death, I would unhesitatingly choose death. I didn't want to subject myself to individual therapy either. But something about her desperate state made me call for an appointment with a psychologist the following day anyway. We had been there earlier that spring. Linda had started crying when she explained how she felt. The psychologist listened to what she said and then he asked me what I thought and I told him. He wasn't so much interested in Linda's mood swings as her life situation, the fact that she didn't have a job and wasn't earning money, and he asked her how this problem could be solved. He was right in what he said, but I didn't understand how him saying this would help her. Subsequently Linda went to see him on her own. Then she called a doctor for an appointment and had a session with her. At that time her mood was a great deal better. Now the situation was different, I had never seen her like this before, not even remotely. She had lost her grip and had fallen so far into her inner darkness that nothing around her had meaning any longer. That was how it seemed to me. She loved our children more than anything else, but not even for them could she come closer to the world.

After I had dropped off the children at the school the following morning, I made some breakfast for Linda and took it to her in the bedroom on a tray.

I had often done that the first year we were together, as nothing made her happier. But then I stopped, I didn't want to put in any more effort to make her happy.

She sat up in bed. She ran her hands across the duvet, back and forth, it was uncanny, they were like the movements of an animal. Then with one hand she lifted the bowl of muesli, with the other she dipped in the spoon and transported it to her mouth. She was so slow that I turned, opened the blinds, and glanced over at the hotel.

Something had broken inside her, I reflected.

She ate half the muesli, then she put down the bowl.

"Are you full?" I said.

She nodded.

"Let's go then, shall we?"

She nodded again.

"Do you want to have a shower first?"

"I can't," she said.

"OK," I said. "You don't have to."

I took her arm and helped her up. She stood looking at the open closet, where her clothes were. The same desperation appeared in her eyes now as when she had looked at the children.

I took a pair of blue jeans and a gray sweater and laid them on the bed by her.

"Is that all right?" I said.

She nodded.

"I'll be waiting in the hall," I said, and left.

We took the elevator and walked arm-in-arm to the taxis outside the Hilton. Her movements were heavy and slow, as if gravity were greater for her than for anyone else. And perhaps that was indeed how it was.

Something had broken inside her, I reflected again.

We got into a taxi, I said the name of the street and the number, the driver signaled to move into Föreningsgatan, which we followed as far as the Concert House, where we turned right, crossed the bridge over the canal, and came into the lower part of town, where we seldom went, we lived our lives between our apartment in Triangeln and the nursery school in Möllevangen.

Outside the door to the building I asked what the code was. She said it mechanically – she remembered all these things so much better than I did.

We took the elevator up, entered a large waiting room. Linda walked slowly to the reception window. I put a cup on the grill of the coffee machine, pressed the button for black, looked around while the cup filled.

Two people were sitting there, heads bowed, trying to occupy as little space as possible. One, a woman, perhaps fifty; the other, a man, perhaps thirty. The woman was pale, plump, dressed colorlessly. The man was also plump, had a sparse beard, greasy hair, and glasses. Beside them sat a woman talking loudly on her phone. A man came in, short hair, dressed formally, health sandals on his feet, presumably a doctor. He stopped in front of them as I took my cup for a sip, he said a name, the middle-aged woman got up, they shook hands, she followed him down the corridor.

"Would you like a cup of coffee?" I asked Linda, who had joined me.

She shook her head.

"Shall we sit down?"

She nodded. Slowly she took the few steps to the sofa, looked at me, I nodded, she sat down. I sat down beside her and held her hand in mine. The woman was still on her phone. There was a radio in the background, I looked up, a speaker under the ceiling. Someone was talking and laughed, it was one of those morning talk shows that were aired everywhere people worked: hairdressing salons, taxis, garages. I thought it inappropriate, it must cut straight into Linda's heart, the life she was excluded from.

I gazed at her. She didn't appear to notice.

I remembered once being in a taxi on our way to a hospital in Stockholm, Linda was terrified the child she would soon be giving birth to was dead, and the radio was on in the taxi. Although I knew the light mood was an agony for her, in the zone of the ultimate horror, on the border between life and death, I didn't dare ask the driver to turn off the radio, I was afraid he would be offended.

I squeezed her hand. She was staring into the middle distance.

"Would you like some water?" I said.

She nodded.

I got up and filled a white plastic cup with water. The sides of the cup were so thin I could feel the water, cold and trembling.

She drank it in one swig.

Around the corner came a woman perhaps a few years younger than me. She stopped and looked at us, Linda got up, the woman smiled and held out a hand. Linda shook it.

"Hi," I said.

We shook hands, and then we walked down the corridor. She stopped outside a door, extended a hand and we went in. A chair on one side of the table, two on the other. A desk beneath the window, a few unclear, neutral lithographs on the walls.

"Please, sit down," she said.

We sat down.

"How are you, Linda?" she asked, sitting with her legs crossed, a notebook in one hand, a pen in the other. Her eyes were friendly, her impression a little impersonal, perhaps because of the pad and the pen.

Linda studied her.

"Not good," she said at length, in an almost inaudible whisper.

The doctor asked several more questions, which I could see were meant to clarify the situation. Each time Linda answered with very few words after a long pause.

"Do you hear voices?" the doctor said.

Long pause.

Voices? I thought. She was way off target. Linda didn't hear voices.

Perhaps there was a list she had to go through and cross off.

"No . . .," Linda said. "Only thoughts . . . I don't want to think them . . ."

"Do you think about suicide, Linda? About taking your own life?"

Linda stared at her. Then she burst into tears.

"But . . . but I . . . can't . . . I . . . can't do that," she said. "The children . . . I . . . can't do that."

"You think about it though?"

Linda nodded.

"Often?"

Linda nodded.

"I . . . I . . . think . . . about it . . . all the time . . . If only . . . if only I had . . . a disease and could die. That would make it . . . easier. For everyone."

Tears came into my eyes and I looked down. I took a slow, deep breath. I couldn't go there. Looked at the carpet, looked at the chair leg, looked at the wastepaper basket in the corner, swallowed.

"Does it feel as if everything is going more slowly?" the doctor said.

Linda nodded.

"You don't have the energy to do anything?"

"No!" Linda sobbed.

"Can you shower? Do you get out of bed at all?"

"No. Occasionally. The children . . . I can't manage . . ."

The doctor wrote something in her notebook. Then she looked at me.

"What's your perception of Linda now?" she said.

"I don't quite know. But I've never seen her as low as this," I said, looking at Linda. "This is completely new."

"You're obviously in a deep depression," the doctor said. "We'll have to try to turn that around. Naturally you'll be given antidepressants. But we don't want you too high when it lets go either, so we have to be careful. One possibility is going to the hospital, of course. Then you'll have peace and quiet around you. At home you have the children and normal life. There might be demands on you it would be best you didn't face. Have you thought about the possibility of going to the hospital?"

Linda stared at me, horror-stricken.

She shook her head.

"I think she'd be better off at home," I said.

"Linda?" the doctor said.

"I don't want to go to the hospital."

"I understand," the doctor said. "Of course you can be at home. It might be best for you. But then I want you to come here regularly. Is that all right?"

Linda nodded.

"It's important you try to get up as much as possible. Try to do what you normally do as much as you can. It doesn't have to be a lot. A little, so that you don't spend the whole day in bed. Could you manage to read to the children, for example?"

"I don't know," Linda said.

"Then you can sit with them and watch children's TV for half an hour. And it's important you get out for some light and air. You have to try to go for a little walk every day."

Linda nodded.

The doctor eyed her.

"I have such . . . terrible . . . fears," Linda said.

"You can take something for that. A tablet for when the fear comes. It works instantly. It might make you a bit sleepy. And we'll give you something for the depression. But I'd be a bit careful to begin with. We don't want you to pick up too quickly."

She got to her feet and sat down in front of the computer. I took Linda's hand and squeezed it.

"You can pick up the medication at any pharmacy," the doctor said, getting up. "And I've written down your next appointment. This Wednesday. Is that OK?"

Linda nodded and we stood up.

"I think it's best if you're not alone, Linda. Someone should always be with you."

"Of course," I said.

She accompanied us to the door, smiled, said goodbye, and gently closed the door.

"Do you think they can get a taxi for us at the reception?" I said.

Linda nodded.

"Then I'll ask."

Linda waited by the door while I spoke to the receptionist. Down on the street I smoked a cigarette.

"It's going to be fine," I said. "It's good you don't have to go to the hospital. So you're there for the children at least, even if you don't feel up to much."

"Yes," she said.

"We can go for a little walk every day. And you can watch TV with them."

"Yes," she said.

"Is that the taxi, I wonder?" I said, looking up the road, where a black Passat was coming. It stopped beside us, and we got in.

"It'll be fine," I said. "You'll soon be free of it."

I knew the worst for Linda, the great nightmare, was going back to the hospital. The thought of the children exacerbated it, having a mother who had been admitted to a psychiatric institution, the stigma of it. I thought the same, hospitalization would define it and seal it as an illness, make it something institutional when it was actually only Linda, a darkness that filled her, and Linda, she was sitting beside me now, the mommy of Vanja, Heidi, and John. It was better for them that she was at home, that this didn't become something alien and dangerous, but something they could see.

As we sat in the taxi, on our way home, I wasn't sure. This was my responsibility. She wasn't in a state to make any balanced decisions, nor did she want to. That was why she had looked at me. If I had nodded and said, you absolutely must go to the hospital, she would have gone.

The doctor had advised this course of action. We had said no, it is better we do it our way.

"When's Ingrid supposed to be coming?" I said.

"I don't know," Linda said softly. "This afternoon sometime."

"That's good," I said. "Then she's here for the children, and they have something else to think about. They must have people around them now. I think that's important."

"Yes," she said.

The taxi slid in by the front of the Hilton and came to a halt, I paid, we got out, I held her arm as we crossed the road and headed for the pharmacy.

Back at home, she went to bed, and was asleep in minutes. I walked from room to room for a while, had a cigarette on the balcony with the door open in case Ingrid called, sat down in my study and switched on my computer, when she was asleep she didn't need me, but when I saw the essay I had been doing in Voss, about Turner and Claude Lorrain, I realized this wasn't the right time and turned the computer off.

I went into the bedroom to see her. The whole weekend she must have been lying there longing for death while we were in town shopping.

There was a ring.

I hurried to the hall, lifted the intercom receiver.

"Hello," I said.

"Ingrid here."

"I'll open the door."

I waited until I heard the elevator stop, then opened the door.

"How is she?" she said, coming out of the elevator.

"Not so good," I said.

I motioned to her suitcase, which she let go of so that I could carry it in.

"We've just been to the doctor's. She said it was a deep depression. And suggested that she ought to go to the hospital. But Linda preferred to be at home. I'd prefer that too."

"Was she a good doctor?"

"Yes, I think so."

"Ayayayaya," she said with a sigh.

"Yes," I said.

"Is she asleep now?"

"She is."

"And the children? Are they worried?"

"No, I don't think so. They haven't noticed much. They're at school as usual."

"That's good," she said, leaning forward to take off her shoes. I was a few meters away from her and wanted the conversation to end. She was angry with me because of what I had written about her in the second novel, and now there was this, with her daughter. At the same time she was dependent on me – I lived here and was the father of her grandchildren – as I was on her and the help she could offer.

She looked at me.

"I thought you could sleep in the living room," I said, turning to carry her suitcase there. "Is that all right?"

"I can sleep wherever I can," she said. "Also with the children, if Sissel wants to sleep in the living room."

"She can sleep in my office," I said.

"Ye-es," she sighed. "But it's good to be here anyway. It's going to be great to see the children."

"They're looking forward to seeing you," I said.

As I was about to leave to pick up the children that afternoon, Ingrid joined me, she wanted to surprise them, I suppose. In the elevator we said nothing. In the street we stopped and looked at each other.

"We can't leave Linda on her own," I said.

"I was thinking the same," Ingrid said. "You go and I'll stay with her."

How was it possible, I thought, as I continued up Södra Förstadsgatan? How could I have forgotten about her? How could I have forgotten that she shouldn't be on her own?

It was just as bad that I had been out so much over the weekend. It was as though the gravity of the situation hadn't hit home. As though everything was normal and what was happening inside her as she lay in the room, excluded from the rest of the family, was only in parentheses.

"Did Grandma come?" Vanja asked. She had run over as soon as she had seen me behind the gate.

I nodded.

"She has, yes. She can't wait to see you."

I strolled across to the nursery school staff and exchanged a few words with them. Everything had gone well, they said, the children had been happy and content. I had thought of telling them Linda was depressed, so they would keep an eye on the children, in case something out of the ordinary occurred, but both Vanja and Heidi were standing next to me and I decided to wait until the following day.

We bought fruit, milk, and yogurt at Hemköp, they were impatient, wanting to get home now that Grandma was there. She would have presents with her, wouldn't she?

When she was with us she always cooked, did the shopping, and kept the kitchen clean. She stretched herself as thin as she could for us, of that there was no doubt. If I hadn't written the book everything in my relationship with her would have been good, but it lay there like a shadow, and we couldn't talk about it.

Strangely enough, it was John who was shy with her when we trooped in through the door. But it didn't last long. After they had unwrapped their presents they ran into Linda to show her. I followed, watching closely. Linda looked at them, sat up, and tried to smile. How nice, she said.

"Come on now, you little varmints," I said. "Mommy has to rest a little."

It wasn't difficult this time. I closed the bedroom door, and then the hall door. Ingrid was in the kitchen cooking.

"When would you like to eat?" she said.

"Anytime," I said. "Whatever suits you."

"Five?" she said.

"That's fine," I said.

I poured the coffee I'd made but forgotten into the thermos and was about to go onto the balcony when the phone rang.

It was an Oslo number and I took it.

It was Elisabeth from Oktober.

"Am I disturbing you?" she said.

"Not at all," I said.

"You're writing, I hope?" she said with a laugh. "But it's good I've managed to get ahold of you. We need to discuss the launch. Number five will be out soon."

"Yes," I said, closing the balcony door and sitting down.

"Have you thought about how you would like to do it?"

"Only in terms of as little as possible."

"In principle you can choose to do whatever you like. There is enormous interest, of course. But I have a suggestion. Aftenposten has been trying to get an interview with you for ages. What about doing that? And nothing else?"

"Sounds good," I said.

"I think it will be."

"There was one other thing. The Book Fair in Oslo this autumn. It would be great if you could come."

"When is it?"

"Mid-September."

"Should be possible," I said.

"Great! Now I know. We can sort out details later. Thank you, Karl Ove."

I put down the phone and poured myself some coffee. The last time Linda was ill it had lasted for more than a year.

I hadn't even thought about that.

What if it just carried on?

I stubbed out my cigarette and went back in. Checked that the children were fine before going into the bedroom. She wasn't asleep, she was lying in bed with her eyes open looking at the ceiling.

"How's it going?" I said, sitting on the edge of the bed.

She turned her head to me. Her eyes were as good as vacant.

"The kids are fine," I said. "They behaved as they usually do at school. And they're happy Ingrid's here. John was a bit shy at first, but he soon picked up."

She looked at me as though she wanted to say something.

"Do you have the energy to get up for dinner?" I said.

She gave a slight nod.

"And to watch Bolibompa with them afterwards?"

She nodded again.

"That's enough," I said. "If you can do that, it's great."

I stood up. I felt unable to withstand her gaze.

"I'll come and get you when it's ready then," I said. "OK?"

She nodded, and I headed for the living room, where I sat down with two of the morning papers I hadn't read yet.

The next day, when I returned home after taking the children to school, Ingrid was sitting on Linda's bed and talking with her. There was a tray of food between them. A bowl of muesli, an egg, fruit, a slice of bread, a glass of juice, a cup of coffee. Linda looked at Ingrid as she had looked at me the past few times, from somewhere deep inside herself. It was as though everything that was said disappeared in that gaze. Everything seemed to vanish into endless space, where it was so small it made no difference, yet it was all she had and therefore clung to. She looked and saw me, then she looked and saw Ingrid.

"They're off at school now," I said, stopping in the doorway.

Ingrid got up.

"Are you done?" she asked Linda. "If so, I'll take the tray with me."

I knew she didn't want to impose, and our bedroom was a boundary she would cross only with extreme reluctance, but I hadn't been at home and she had gone in because Linda was her daughter.

"Would you like to go for a little walk?" I said after Ingrid had left.

Linda nodded and slowly got to her feet.

"Shall I find you some clothes?"

She nodded again.

I laid out a pair of trousers and a sweater and went into the hall to wait. Passed her a jacket, put out some shoes, took her arm when she was ready, and walked beside her to the lift. She stared at the floor as the elevator descended, probably to avoid the mirror.

Outside, the sun was shining. The trees between the market square and the road were green, thick with leaves. People walked to and fro across the flagstone square, cars whizzed by. We ambled toward the park.

"I love you, Linda," I said.

She gave a start and looked at me.

"Things are terrible now, but they will be good. I promise you. You just have to hold on tight."

She continued to stare into the distance.

"I know it's absolutely unbearable, but you have to stick it out. Then you'll be fine."

We went over the road at the crosswalk, walked along the sidewalk, past the Mexican restaurant, the hairdresser's, the denim shop. The sky was blue, the grass in the park over the road green. People sat dotted around, some with bikes by them.

"You're a fantastic mother, Linda," I said. "I know you think you're letting the children down, but you aren't. You can't do anything about this. It's just something that happens inside you. I promise you."

She looked at me with the same semi-absent, semi-imploring gaze. She said nothing. We crossed the road, entered the park.

"Why don't we sit down for a bit over there?" I said, nodding toward the stone wall beneath the trees in the middle of the park.

"Everything's going to be fine," I said.

An elderly woman with a dog strolled past, behind her came a young woman on a bicycle, she had a backpack on her back and gave us a wide berth. From the playground came the voices of children. Three or four parents were with them, I saw.

We sat down on the wall.

Linda burst into tears. She sobbed aloud, her shoulders shook. I put my arm around her and rested my head against her neck.

"It's going to be fine. I love you. It's awful now, but it'll pass."

The people sitting on the lawn around us glanced over. A gust of wind blew, the leaves on the trees rustled. Linda sat bent over, crying with all her heart, something seemed to have crashed inside her.

I stroked her back.

What darkness are you in now, Linda?

What darkness are you in?

"I love you. You're a brilliant person. You're a wonderful mother. This is going to be fine. You have to hold on."

Gradually the tears subsided. I held out my arm, she slipped hers inside, and then we got up and walked down the gravel path, as slowly as an elderly couple. I was racked by restlessness.

Ingrid came into the hall as we took off our coats.

"Well done, Linda," she said. "It's so good that you managed the walk."

"Do you want to rest a little?" I said.

She nodded. I accompanied her into the bedroom.

"Would you like a radio? Then you'll have something to listen to while you lie here." She shook her head.

"I just want to sleep," she said.

She lay down, pulled the duvet half over her head, and closed her eyes.

"OK," I said. "I'll come back in half an hour to check you're all right."

I went for a smoke. I looked down as I passed the kitchen, where Ingrid was sitting with the newspaper open on the table in front of her, I didn't want a conversation. I knew she liked me, but I presumed what I had written overshadowed that, and I knew she probably drew a straight line between what Linda was going through and what I had done. I didn't know she was thinking that, but I had a strong suspicion she was.

We talked about what we would have for the evening meal. We talked about Linda, how we should try to get her out of bed as often as possible. We talked about the children and who should do what for them. But we didn't talk about her, we didn't talk about me, and we didn't talk about what I'd written about her.

Looking down, I slunk past, telling myself Linda was the priority for both of us now.

Sitting on the balcony, I caught the sound of the phone ringing. I rushed in and answered it. It was the real estate agent. She had just done another viewing. There had been seven people, but unfortunately there had been no offers. She would be doing another viewing this weekend. She said it would probably sell. I said that was good. She said there seemed to be something wrong with the shower, one of the people at the viewing had turned it on and they weren't able to turn it off, and then water had spurted out from the pipe. I said that was right, there was something wrong with the shower and the pipes. I would have to get someone to look at it. Good, she said, and we hung up.

I looked in on Linda. She was asleep, I came back out, went to my study, where I could be at peace. Switched on the computer. Flipped through the book of Claude Lorrain pictures I had bought in New York when I'd been there only a few weeks earlier. It felt like several years ago. I had fainted at a venue in Manhattan after doing a reading. I hadn't eaten all day, was so nervous, and I had drunk a beer with my American publisher, and when we were standing outside and she introduced me to an elderly Egyptian writer, who was holding court, suddenly I couldn't stand upright but had to go to the steps and sit down. I held my head in my hands and felt the blackness gathering inside me and rising, a wave of inescapable numbing weariness and giddiness. The elderly Egyptian, who was a great poet and justifiably held everyone's attention, came over to me, friendly all of a sudden, put his arm around my shoulders and asked if I was all right. I said I was, and he went back to his circle. Now I couldn't even sit, so I stood up and staggered over to the publisher and said I had to go home, at once, and she said she would find a taxi. I couldn't even wait, so I lay down on the sidewalk and closed my eyes and was gone. I came to again when she placed her hand on my shoulder and I realized I couldn't have been out for more than one or maybe two minutes. But people were staring at me where I lay. I managed to struggle to my feet, she opened the door of the waiting taxi, gave the address to the driver, and then off we drove through this immense town.

I had seen a picture by Claude Lorrain in New York, and I was writing about it now. Strangely enough, I wrote with ease and focus, everything else vanished until, after lifting my head and looking at the blinds covering the window in front of me, shimmering with spring light, I suddenly thought about Linda. I switched off the computer, got up, and poked my head around the door.

She was sitting up in bed. She was scratching at the duvet and looked up at me. Leaning forward and scratching at the bedcover. Then she seemed to be brushing something away. All this frightened me, her movements were so unfamiliar.

"I have such fears, Karl Ove," she said. "I'm so afraid."

"Can't you take one of the tablets you were given?"

"Yes, but the effect doesn't last very long. And then it just gets worse."

"I can go and get one. What were they called again?"

She told me. I went into the kitchen, one shelf was completely taken over by her medication, I found the box she wanted, poured a glass of water, and carried them in to her.

She took a tablet and leaned back.

I lay beside her.

We didn't say anything. I held her hand. I thought about what I had written, and the feelings Lorrain's pictures evoked in me filled me with a kind of peace, which I then immediately repressed, what sort of monster was I to think about that while she was lying beside me wanting to die?

"Would you like anything to eat? Fruit or something?"

She didn't answer. I looked at her.

"Grapes?" I said.

She nodded, I got up, went into the kitchen, which fortunately was unoccupied, put a small bunch into a bowl, and took it back to her.

"Still no radio?" I said, putting the bowl down beside her.

"I'm not up to listening to anything."

"Not even music?"

"No."

She pulled the duvet over her and turned her head to the wall.

On our way home from school Vanja wanted to know if Mommy was still sleeping.

"Yes, she is. She's not feeling well, you know. But it'll soon pass."

"It'll never pass," Vanja said. "She's always sick."

"No, she isn't," I said. "But right now she is. So she needs her rest."

"I do too," Vanja said. "I want to rest with her."

"I'm sure you could," I said. "If you keep still and stay quiet, that would be fine."

"Me too," Heidi said.

"That's OK," I said. "But just one at a time. Shall we say that?"

But this didn't go too well. Vanja started nagging Linda to get up, and Heidi was no better.

Vanja refused to leave the room and it ended with me having to carry her out. I tried to turn it into a joke, some fun, but she was very angry.

I sat her down in her room. She wanted to run back and tried to dodge past me.

"Vanja," I said. "It's true that Mommy's ill. She needs some peace and quiet. It'll soon be over. I promise you."

"It won't," she said, and looked down at the floor.

"Come on. Let's go and watch a film."

"I don't want to."

"What do you want to do then?"

"I want to see Mommy."

"I understand. And you will be able to. But not right now."

She sat down and started moving all her toy figures around as though I didn't exist. I watched her for a while, then left.

The next day we went back to the doctor. She asked more or less the same questions she had on the previous occasion. Linda was equally monosyllabic.

"What we have to do is reverse the depression," she said after a while. "One way to do that is through ECT, electroconvulsive therapy. I know it sounds terrible, but the fact is it works. In a sense it applies a brake to the process and gives the brain a kind of new start. Is that perhaps something you could imagine trying? It's thoroughly safe, you know. And it will stop this."

Linda turned to me when the doctor said this, and her expression was the same as when she had looked at me the first time the doctor had suggested going to the hospital.

Her mouth opened and closed as though she were gasping for air, and her eyes streamed with tears.

"No," she said. "No."

"I don't think so," I said. "I think we'll just have to ride this one out."

"I understand," the doctor said, looking at Linda. "The most important thing is you have to get out of bed for a while every day. You've been walking, so that's good. If you have the strength it would be good if you could do some of what you normally do."

"I don't do anything," Linda whispered.

"I beg your pardon."

"I don't do anything."

"It's not so easy to see when you're depressed," she said. "It's like you don't do anything and so you're not worth anything. But I imagine there's something you like doing more than anything else, isn't there?"

Linda shook her head.

"You don't have any hobbies, something you particularly like doing?" Linda shook her head again.

"You like films," I said. "And reading."

"They're too much for me," she said.

"Well," the doctor said. "I wasn't thinking about big things. If you can put on the dishwasher, even if it's only for a couple of glasses, that's good."

Linda nodded.

"How's it going with your children? Do you spend any time with them?"

Linda shook her head.

"Yes, you do," I said. "You've watched TV with them."

"That's good, Linda. Perhaps you should try to read to them as well. Do you think you could manage that?"

"Yes."

She read to them that afternoon, one after the other, as she didn't have the energy to deal with all three of them at once, and they would only have vied for her attention. First she read for John while Heidi was in the hall waiting her turn, then Heidi, and last of all Vanja. After that she slept. A pattern was beginning to crystallize in these new days of hers: while I took the children to school, she had breakfast in bed, then she got dressed and went for a short walk with either Ingrid or me, slept, got up and had lunch, started the dishwasher, slept, read to the children when they came home, slept, got up and had her evening meal, watched TV with the children, slept. Every so often I wrote a little, but not much, just a few lines every day. Elisabeth called, she had an agreement with Aftenposten, they would send a journalist next week.

"The journalist's name is Siri Økland," Elisabeth said.

"But she works for Bergens Tidende. Wasn't it supposed to be someone from Aftenposten?"

"Yes, it was, but they work together. The big regional papers. They often print the same articles."

"OK," I said.

I had actually decided I would never do any more interviews for Bergens Tidende because of the way they had behaved toward me when the first volume came out and because of the way they had treated me and my books since. Everything they had written had a negative slant; sometimes it was sarcastic to the point of mudslinging, sometimes morally indignant. I hadn't read the paper myself, but both Mom and Yngve lived in the area BT covered, so I had an impression of the tone they used. When I was in Odda I had received an inquiry via the event organizers regarding an interview for BT, and the journalist had assured them it would be done with propriety, it wouldn't be slanted in the way things had been so far. This was so outrageous that my jaw dropped when I read it. First of all they pissed on me, then they asked if they could have an interview, and promised they wouldn't piss on me again.

But I really didn't want to create problems for anyone. I trusted Siri Økland and, besides, the deal was already agreed. Publishing an interview she had conducted couldn't be damaging.

Linda wasn't getting any better. Whenever I was alone with her I told her the same, I said I loved her, I knew she was having a terrible time, but it would pass and everything would be fine. It was as though everything I said disappeared inside her, it just dissolved in the darkness and was gone. She never answered, nor did she look at me as I spoke. We walked to the little park, sat there for a while, walked back. I realized this was probably going to be long term, and the next time we went to the doctor I asked for a sick note so that we could cancel the trip to Corsica and get our money reimbursed. She read to the children every afternoon and was worn out afterwards, but I was so happy she could do it, this was like a lifeline, a vital minimum for the children, which meant they weren't marked by what was happening to her. That is to say, this was the case for Heidi and John, they accepted everything as it was, while Vanja, on the other hand, was filled with a mass of conflicting emotions she didn't know how to handle. One evening she had a furious outburst. Linda was sitting in a chair in the living room and Vanja started hitting her as she shouted.

"You're ugly! You're ugly! You're ugly!" she yelled.

I lifted her off Linda, she kicked and wriggled and tried to hit me. I had to sit down with her and hold her tight for several minutes before she quieted down and was still. Afterwards, sitting alone in my study while everyone was asleep, I cried. I don't know why, I just cried. At school they said everything was fine, they couldn't see any difference in their behavior. Vanja was the oldest child there now and had come into her own. She also had a new best friend, they would start in the same class in the autumn, we had chosen this school for precisely this reason, and they talked forever on the phone in the afternoons. And she had a strong attachment to her grandmother.

Children do what is necessary for them, they take what they need, compensate and counterbalance, all without realizing this is what they are doing.

One morning Linda came into the kitchen. She was trembling and in tears. She held a credit card in her hand.

"I found this on the floor," she said. "It was on the floor."

She cried as she said it.

"You don't keep things clean," she said. "Everywhere there's chaos."

"It's my credit card," Ingrid said. "It must've fallen out of my pocket."

"It was on the floor," Linda said in a trembling voice. "You're so messy."

She turned and slowly shuffled back to her bedroom. I followed her.

"It doesn't mean anything," I said. "I appreciate that you think everything's in chaos. But it isn't. Everything's under control. Completely. Don't give it another thought."

She was shaking. I wondered if it was a side effect of all the medication she was taking.

"You'd better get some sleep," I said. "But the credit card doesn't mean a thing. It's not what you think. Everything's under control."

"No, it isn't," she said, lying down.

"Yes, it is," I said. "It is. Actually everything's fine. We have three great children. They're beginning to grow up. They're doing very well. You've had a book accepted. You're a writer. We have money. We could buy a house if we wanted. You see, everything's fine. Everything is actually good."

She looked at me as I said that. Her eyes were large. It was as though she knew nothing of what I had told her. As though it were new to her.

Then she closed her eyes, I got up and said I would be back soon. I went into the kitchen, tipped some coffee into the filter, and switched on the machine.

That evening Ingrid asked me if I had the second novel in audiobook format. I nodded. She asked if she could borrow it. That was the last thing I wanted. Why would she want to go through it? What else could I do but find her a copy and hand it over.

She always turned in early, about the same time as the kids, closed the door, and was on her own until the next morning, when she got up and made pancakes or baked bread for the children. I usually watched TV for an hour after everybody had gone to bed unless I was in my study leafing through one of the art books. This evening I could hear she hadn't fallen asleep as she usually did. When I turned in, she was still awake. The next morning she said she hadn't slept a wink all night. She had been listening to the novel I had written. She said I had sent it to her just before it was about to go to press, she hadn't had time to read it and hadn't understood the Norwegian. That was why she had told me what I'd written about her was fine. She had trusted me.

As she said this she was standing in front of the stove making pancakes. I stood with a cup in my hand, on my way out to smoke a cigarette. I was afraid of her. But I couldn't go, nor could I defend myself, I had to stand there and listen and concede she was right. And she was too. It was her prerogative. She was furious with me. But in the bedroom we had Linda, whom she loved and who she feared would die, in the living room we had her grandchildren, whom she loved and for whom she would do anything, even sacrifice her own life, of that I was sure. Linda was my wife, her grandchildren were my children. She was distraught, and so was I. I couldn't make excuses for myself. I couldn't defend myself, all the right was on her side. The only argument I had was that she had been given the book to read in advance, and she had approved it, but now that was invalid because it was true what she said, she'd only had a few days because the manuscript had been sent to the wrong address.

That was all she said, but I knew her, she was furious, sad, and afraid.

Beneath everything lay the unspoken reproach that it was because of what I had written that Linda had lost her bearings and was in bed. I felt it all the time. It came from both me and her. She was lying in there, and I was keeping everyone away from her. I was keeping the children away from her, and I was keeping Ingrid away from her. It was a terrible feeling, filled with gloom, because it was my fault she had ended up there, in the bedroom, in bed. I hadn't taken care of her. Had I done so, this wouldn't have happened. But I had done the opposite. I had made sure the pressure on her had been unbearable. What she was struggling with was her identity, who she was. Once before, when the pressure in her life had been immense, everything had unraveled, and she had fled into a kind of fantasy version of herself and then plummeted into the darkness. There was no connection between the person she was and the person she wanted to be or thought she was. The difference between the Linda I first set eyes on and the Linda I met two years later was enormous. She had caught up with herself, I had thought. She was whole or "wholer." Having children was something she could feel at ease with, what had to be done and who she had to be were obvious, there was no choice, that was how it was and that was how she was. Then I had written that life was an illusion, a notion, inauthentic. And not only that, I had talked at length about life to everyone. Her life, our children, our problems. And not only that, this particular book exploded in the public arena and was on everyone's lips. It hit her where she was most vulnerable, in the question of her identity, who she was. I held up a mirror, and not only did she see herself there, but so did everyone else.

After the books had come out her therapist had called her once from Stockholm, I answered the phone, her voice was ice-cold as she asked to speak to Linda. She knew Linda inside out, she knew exactly what she was struggling with and understood how dangerous my experiment was.

Every time I walked through the hall into the bedroom I had the same feeling, that I had damaged her and now she was hiding. We had lived together for almost ten years, and my premise was that we were like everyone else and our conflicts were like everyone else's and Linda had to manage as everyone else did. I had seen her outbursts, I had seen her attempts to control me, but I hadn't seen her fear of losing everything, the feeling that she was standing on the edge of a precipice. I had seen buckets and cloths, washing machines and bags of diapers. I had seen strollers and children's clothes, baths and cots. I had seen how close Linda was to the children, she gave them everything they needed, but I hadn't seen what it had cost her. Now I could see, for she had lost her grip and was sinking. She was sinking deeper and deeper, and she was drawing further and further away. Everyday life was beyond her reach now. She could see it from the depths of where she was, and if she exerted herself to the maximum she could stretch out a hand and touch it, be there for a few minutes, have a child on her lap, no more though, nothing of what a life consists of, and which is so easy, so unbelievably easy, giving them some fruit, telling a joke, asking them about something that interests them, dressing them, going with them to the park. All this is easy, and therefore nothing we appreciate while it is happening; it is only later – when the children are bigger – that it can hit us, what we did when they were two or four, both they and we are different people now, and the people we were then are lost forever.

This is how it is. Life is easy, life is a game, until the bottom falls out, and you fall, you are in the hospital and you plunge into the darkness, then it is suddenly impossible, then it is suddenly unattainable. Linda could see this but was unable to do anything about it, her thoughts, even when her children were jumping around in there, were about her not being worthy of life, we would be better off without her, she was destroying everything, and she continually fantasized about dying, which was so radically removed from us, who wanted to live, this was unbearable.

Ingrid accompanied Linda on walks to the park, I saw them, the daughter with her head bowed, her plodding movements, her empty eyes, the mother with her arm entwined in hers, encouraging, chatting, positive. I accompanied Linda on walks to the park, I told her I loved her, she was having a terrible time now, but it would pass, and everything I said disappeared inside her, there was no resistance, her inner life was like an abyss and the darkness so dense that nothing could lighten it. Nothing. Not even those she loved most – Vanja, Heidi, and John – could lighten the darkness.

My mother came, we had arranged a long time ago that the two grand mothers would be at home and help while I sat in the cabin writing the end of the novel. That was no longer relevant, but we still needed them, for now we were in dire need.

Mom and Ingrid had always got on well together, as different as they were, and they did so now too, as the tensions at home increased, because almost everything that lay between us was unsaid and unprocessed, bordering on unconscious, traces were evident in our body language and our voices, impossible to pinpoint yet hugely present.

In the evenings, when everyone was asleep, I sat up talking to Mom. It felt like betrayal. It shouldn't have felt like betrayal because I was being torn to shreds and needed someone to talk to, but it still felt like betrayal because I was guilty of what I was being torn to shreds over, and it was not me who was suffering but Linda, so I had no right to the relief I gained from talking to someone who was unconditionally on my side.

Mom said Linda was in a much worse state than she had imagined. She sat on the sofa knitting while I sat in the chair with my feet on the table and a cup of coffee in my hand. She didn't say this was what she had feared when Linda and I had got together, but I knew it was the case and thought it strange I had never been afraid of this outcome. I had been sure everything would be fine. My philosophy had been to follow your heart. Not your mind, not rationality, not money, but your heart. My first thought when we got together had been that I wanted to have children with her. Not one, not two, but three. And we had them. When I wrote about us, I had also followed my heart. It was cold then.

I called the travel agent and canceled the trip to Corsica. The plan had been that we would be there for a week at first, just Linda, Vanja, Heidi, John, and I, then Yngve and his kids, and Asbjørn and his family would join us there the following week. The departure date was the day after the deadline for the novel, the trip was supposed to be the reward for everything. Now I could forget the deadline, the novel had been set aside, it meant nothing. The real estate agent called regularly, she was doing viewings during the week and on weekends, she put ads in the papers and on the Net, people came, saw, and no one wanted it. I went for a stroll in the park with Linda, she put plates in the dishwasher, slept, watched TV with the children, read to them. Sometimes the fear in her grew so strong that she turned white and was incapable of moving, then she took an extra tablet and entered a kind of twilight state where she could sleep. Oh, Linda, Linda. Enough was happening around the children, with two grandmothers there, by and large they were happy, they had already got used to their mommy being ill. I didn't know what to do. Occasionally my anger spilled over, it rose inside me, couldn't she pull herself together, get up, and take hold of her life? I love you, it's terrible now, but it'll be fine. We went for a walk, she put on the dishwasher, had lunch with us, watched TV with the children, read to them. I knew that all her thoughts were black. I knew she wanted to die, but she couldn't.

Evening meal in the kitchen. Ingrid, Sissel, Vanja, Heidi, John, and I. Linda in the bedroom. Without looking at me, Ingrid said:

"Have you considered the consequences of writing about your children?"

"Yes," I said.

"How it will be for them when they grow up? Everyone knowing who they are? Have you taken that into account? That they're vulnerable?"

This is her daughter, I thought. Let her be angry at me.

"I don't think there's any danger," I said. "I don't think that any of what I've written is dangerous."

It sounded hollow, she looked at me, we continued to eat, the children slipped down from their chairs, they hadn't noticed anything unusual, there hadn't been any raised voices.

The next day was a Saturday, the sun was shining and we were all going to the park, we had packed a picnic basket and taken a large blanket, it was the first time Linda had been out with the children since I came home from Iceland. Ingrid and Sissel and the children were waiting for us outside, I didn't know that, I was walking arm-in-arm with Linda through the corridors in the cellar and emerged at the back of the building, which was closer to the park. I assumed they were already there.

After waiting for a quarter of an hour, Linda's mother had lost her temper and cursed me, Mom told me later that night, when everyone was in bed. Mom was also angry, it was her son Ingrid had cursed, but I said it didn't matter, and I understood Ingrid. She had every right to be furious with me. But she also liked me, and that was perhaps harder to understand.

All this was kept from Linda. When she came all the tensions between us ceased, then we concentrated on her. Of course I said nothing about it when we were alone, even if that was exactly the kind of thing we discussed normally, other people, the relations between them. Linda saw other people – that was a gift she had. Now there was nothing left of it in her. She rarely spoke, the little strength she had she devoted to the children. Nor did I tell her that Book 5 was due to come out soon. I was expecting a storm because I had written about a rape allegation I'd been subjected to once, and bearing in mind all the other trivialities I had written that had ended up as front-page stories I considered it inconceivable that this would not suffer a similar fate.

I had also received some furious e-mails from people I'd written about and whom I had accordingly made anonymous. But the woman who said I had raped her, she existed, she lived in Bergen, and it wouldn't have surprised me if someone had located her and interviewed her, although neither her name nor anything else was mentioned that might identify her.

For this reason, the day I was to be interviewed by Siri Økland I said nothing about it to Linda, who was in bed after going out for a walk with her mother, this time all the way to Pildamm Park, only that I had an interview and it would take an hour, maximum two. She said OK, and then I left for the Art Exhibition Hall, where I had done almost all the interviews for the first four books. Siri Økland was waiting there with a photographer. The interview went well, although I was constantly on the defensive, constantly entrenched, it was obvious that what I had done was wrong. Afterwards there were photos outside, in the street, and then I came home. Ingrid was out picking up the children, Linda was asleep, Mom was in the living room reading. She looked up when I entered.

"So how's it going here?" I said.

"Well, it's been good," she said. "Linda got up while you were out. She joined us in the kitchen. She talked for an hour."

"Really?"

"Yes. She cried and talked about how she felt."

"What did she say?"

"She said she couldn't do anything and she wasn't doing anything. She said she was utterly useless. She couldn't handle the children on her own, she didn't have a job, and it didn't look like she was going to get one either. She was desperate."

"But she talked," I said.

"Yes, she talked."

One morning Linda had made her bed and was sitting on the duvet with her back to the wall when I went in, and although the look she sent me was still desperate, she appeared to be different and stronger than the day before. I couldn't put my finger on what it was. Perhaps it was that not everything just vanished inside her, not everything just streamed inward, but that something also came out. She'd made her bed, she was sitting on the duvet, and she met my gaze.

"I tried to read a little," she said.

"Oh yes?" I said.

"Can't do it."

"That doesn't matter," I said. "It's good you're up. Feel like going for a walk?"

She nodded. We ambled through the small park, crossed the road, followed the wooden fence along the old stadium into Pildamm Park, turned, and strolled back.

Instead of lying down and sleeping as soon as we arrived, she asked me to put a radio in the bedroom. I did, found a channel with classical music, closed the door behind me, and went into the study. Not long afterwards the phone rang. It was Yngve. He said Bergens Tidende had a big spread about Book 5. Well, several spreads. Including an article about the rape allegation.

"They close the article by saying BT has her name," Yngve said.

"What the hell do they mean by that? Is it a threat?"

"I don't know," he said.

"Anyway, the book hasn't come out yet," I said. "There's a release date."

"Doesn't look like they've taken any notice of that," Yngve said. "And it's the same negative slant."

"I'll give the publisher a call. See you."

I called Elisabeth. She said that what had happened was that they had given a copy of the manuscript to Siri Økland, as she would be interviewing me. The condition had been that the manuscript was only to be used for that purpose. They had promised and then proceeded to break their promise. Elisabeth had spoken to Siri, she was very sorry, she said she had nothing to do with it, they'd ordered her to hand over the manuscript. Elisabeth was livid. It wasn't unusual for a newspaper not to stick to the release date, Verdens Gang never did for example, and as a result they didn't receive the books to be reviewed in advance. But this time BT had been given the manuscript because they were the only ones to have a prepublication interview, and they had made an agreement and given their promise. Which they broke without a second thought. Why? They probably reckoned they had the right to treat me as they liked because in their eyes I had done something deeply immoral.

"But they haven't printed the interview yet?" I said.

"No, they will on the launch day."

"I'll pull it in that case. What do you think?"

"I think we should. I'll call them at once."

I hung up, strode to the balcony and took out a cigarette, then went back to the bedroom, where Linda was lying with her eyes closed. She opened them when I entered.

"How did it go with the radio?"

"I can't take anything in. Not even music."

She cried.

I lay down beside her.

"You're better already, Linda. You're closer now than you were only a few days ago. It's a question of letting go. I'm sure of it."

"I'm so afraid," she said.

"I know," I said. "But everything's fine. Everything's fine."

She lay back and pressed her head against the mattress.

Her movements were quicker; there was something new about her now.

I picked up the children from school, walked through Triangeln Mall and out the back, where the playground was only a block away. Vanja and Heidi stopped by the railing alongside the parking lot, which they wanted to climb, I took a deep breath and said yes, John sat with his head back staring up at the sky, where the white vapor trails from two planes formed a cross.

My phone rang. It was Elisabeth.

"I've spoken to them several times today," she said. "The last time the editor in chief called. They're going to publish the interview anyway."

"But I want to pull it!"

"That makes no difference. They're invoking the right to freedom of expression."

"What! Are they crazy?"

"Dad, Dad, look," Heidi shouted. She leaned back, held on with only one hand, and theatrically threw the other out to the side. I smiled and gave her a thumbs-up.

"Freedom of expression? They've committed a breach of contract. They've ignored the release date. And then they want to publish on the basis of freedom of expression?"

"Yes, that's basically it. They've got lawyers and the whole box of tricks. They're going to publish anyway. We can't do anything."

"I'm never going to do another interview with that newspaper for the rest of my life. I never want anything to do with them."

"I absolutely agree," Elisabeth said. "And I doubt they'll get any interviews with other Oktober authors for a while either."

"Anyway, thank you," I said.

"We'll talk later. The reviews will be in soon. But you never read them anyway, do you."

"Geir will brief me, I imagine. All right, bye."

"OK, bye."

I hung up and put the phone in my pocket.

"Come on," I said, and started to walk. Stopped, turned. "Come on now!"

They slowly balanced their way toward me.

What two-faced bastards. Oh, how I hated it. Oh, the righteous indignation. Oh, fucking hell. Freedom of speech my ass.

May they burn in hell.

At the playground Vanja and Heidi headed straight for the tree they called the "climbing tree." John wanted to go on the swing, I pushed him, occasionally grabbing him by the feet when he came back, then he laughed, and he laughed even more when I raised him by the feet and swung him back as hard as I could. Now it was out, I thought, now everyone knew. Tomorrow the papers would be full of it. KNAUSGAARD SUSPECTED OF RAPE. I had told the events of those days only to those closest to me. I had been so frightened it would be in the papers. It never had been, but now I had written about it, they could just help themselves. But if I hadn't, some people would have known that I was going easy on myself, I was holding back on one of the most consequential incidents of my life, and by writing about myself I had given everyone else the right to write what they liked about my life. It would have come out sooner or later.

I lifted John from the swing and put him in the sand. He didn't want to play on his own, and walked beside me to the bench on the other side of the pit. I lifted him up and sat him on my lap, wrapped my arms around him, and rested my head on his neck.

"My little Johnny boy," I said.

"Don't, Daddy," he said.

"OK," I said, straightening up. "Can you see the girls?"

He pointed. They were sitting among the leaves.

What were they doing?

Talking perhaps. I could dimly hear Heidi's characteristic laugh and Vanja's put-on voice.

A quarter of an hour later we made for home. Linda was in bed when we arrived, but after the children had taken off their shoes and run into the bedroom she got up.

"Mommy, can you read to me?" Vanja said.

She nodded, took a book from the pile on the desk, sat down, and the three children were a jumble of limbs around her.

The next morning I was sure there would be journalists outside. Bergens Tidende had written about the rape allegation, it was out there, and even though no journalist had, so far, been here to see me – the nearest they had come was to take photos of the apartment and interview people in the vicinity – they had contacted everyone I knew and I assumed it had to be only a question of time before they came here. And now there was a story that would lure them out.

I dressed the children, put John in the stroller, checked on Linda, who was dozing, said we were off, leaned over and kissed her on the brow, rushed back to the children, opened the elevator door, pushed the stroller in, and pressed the cellar button. If there were journalists outside I would meet them with the children, and there was a rear entrance to the building they wouldn't know about, I thought, pushed the stroller along the corridors, dragged it backward up the steps, opened the door, went out, followed Föreningsgatan, and took the backstreets up to the nursery school.

On the way home I stopped before the market square and scrutinized the area around the entrance. No one resembling a journalist there. I felt a little stupid. I wasn't so important that they would keep a watch on the apartment building where I lived.

I had become paranoid, I mused, walked over to the fruit stall and bought a couple of kilos of grapes and some apples, took the elevator up, sliced an apple for Linda, put it in a bowl with some grapes, and took them in to her. She sat up.

"How's it all going?" she said.

Oh, how happy that question made me.

"Fine," I said. "Eat now and rest a bit, then let's go out for a walk, shall we?"

"OK."

"I'll just give Geir a call first."

"Angell or Gulliksen?"

"Angell," I said, taking the phone with me onto the balcony and calling him.

"Do you know what's in Dagbladet today?" he said.

"No," I said. "Damned if I want to know either."

"It says you can get ten years in jail."

"Oh."

"Yes, you can say that again. First Aftenposten's reviewer wants to have you imprisoned and now Dagbladet."

"Right now I wouldn't mind," I said. "Being in prison, I mean."

"I thought you already were."

"Ha ha."

"How's it going down there actually?"

"In fact, better. Linda's a bit better. Not much, but the little bit suggests it's on the turn."

"Poor Linda," Geir said.

"Yes," I said. "She's been through hell."

I hung up. When I returned to the bedroom Linda was in the shower. I lay down on the bed. She came in, took some clothes from the cupboard, and dressed. We walked in the park, it was raining, we sat on the stone wall beneath the dripping trees without saying anything, and then we headed for home and had lunch. She filled the dishwasher, turned in, and lay listening to music, I wrote a few lines about Olav Duun. After half an hour I got up and went in to see Linda.

"Would you like some water or anything?" I said.

She turned her head slowly and looked at me.

"No, thank you," she said.

"What's the music?"

"I don't know."

There was a clatter in the kitchen.

"It's good you're listening to music," I said. "A few days ago you weren't up to it. You're making progress. Slowly but . . ."

I smiled. She looked at me.

"It's all going to be fine," I said.

She looked at me.

"I love you," I said.

She looked at me. Everything I said and did disappeared into that look.

She turned her head back and stared at the ceiling.

"I'll go and do a bit more writing," I said. "Back soon."

My mother traveled home, Ingrid traveled home, it was summer. Linda got up several times a day, read books, managed to do more with the children, and almost imperceptibly slipped back into a life she shared with us, and even if there was still something dejected and gloomy about her, there was a big difference, she was no longer outside the family, for which she had a few moments at the end of the day, but inside it. I went online and searched for a holiday home in Österlen. We had to get out of the apartment, we wouldn't manage a long journey though, so Österlen was perfect, it was only an hour away by car.

I found a vacancy and phoned the owner of the house, transferred some money into her account, rented a car for a week, and then we packed it to the gills and drove to the east coast. The town was called Hammar, the house stood beneath a steep hill; on the side away from us, out of sight, lay the sea. We parked the car outside the house, met the owner, who showed us the three small rooms we would be staying in, I unloaded the luggage, and then we climbed up the hill to have a look around. The sun was out and the sky was a cloudless blue. The hill was green, and from the top of it the sea that stretched out below us was glittering and misty. We clambered down the steep, thirty-meter-high, sandy slope. Linda didn't want to at first, but I held her hand and led her down. We sat next to each other on the beach, it stretched for kilometers in both directions, while the children paddled in the water, there wasn't a soul around.

Linda was silent, but she was here, she had walked here. The hill was too steep for the children and Linda to climb back up, so we trudged along the beach until the incline was gentle enough and then along a path up the grassy slope, climbed over a fence, and reached the top again. The countryside beneath us was completely flat, full of fields and farms as far as the eye could see. Seeing this and driving through it made me feel happy. Over the past year we had been here quite often, renting a car over the weekend, at first driving around, then we had started going to viewings. We were looking for a place that we could use on weekends and during school holidays. I loved this countryside, not just what was here with the rolling fields and long low houses, but also farther inland, the forests and lakes. It wasn't mine, it didn't exist in me, and perhaps that was the reason for the attraction.

We walked back down and had something to eat, the children were in bed, and Linda and I sat outside as the dusk thickened around us, and crows occupied a tree only a stone's throw away, they came flying in from all sides, there must have been more than a hundred of them, the whole tree was black, the air was filled with their shrill cries.

We went to the beach the next day and were there for a couple of hours before we drove to Simrishamn and had lunch. Beside the restaurant there was a real estate agent's, we went in and were given a brochure of all the houses that were for sale in the district. On the way home we drove to one, it was nice, but it stood alone in the middle of a plain and made a cold, desolate impression. Once home, we had a barbecue and then watched the World Cup before going to bed. This became the pattern for the week. Beach, town, viewing, barbecue, football.

On the third day, on our way to Simrishamn, Linda started laughing in the backseat.

I turned around quickly.

"Long time since I've heard that sound," I said.

On the fourth day, on our way home in the afternoon, we drove to a house in a village a few kilometers inland. As we came onto the road where it was supposed to be, I decided this place wouldn't work, it was obviously a residential area and we wanted a holiday home, alone and free, nothing that could remotely remind us of our subdivision hell.

We parked by the house, Linda said there was no point going in, there was nothing for us, I said we might as well take a peek while we were here.

We got out of the car and walked around the corner.

Christ, this is the one, I thought.

Two houses stood at right angles to each other, like a little L. There was also a third house, much smaller than the other two. Between the houses was a large well-established garden. It had to be at least fifty years old. In some places it was completely overgrown, but it was beautiful and perfect for the children as it had a variety of nooks and crannies that were connected in a labyrinthine way.

"What do you think?" I said, looking at Linda.

"It's lovely," she said.

"I think it's brilliant," I said. "Shall we buy it?"

"Maybe," she said. The slightly indifferent tone to her voice had more to do with her mental state than the house, I thought. John left his water pistol in the garden and that was a sign we'd have to go back. I arranged a viewing with the real estate agent and two days later we were there again. We said we would give it some thought. We drove home, were there for a couple of days, and then we flew to Norway and stayed with my mother for two weeks, and by then Linda was on the upswing, toward a lightness and joy, she talked a lot, laughed a lot, had lots of ideas and great energy, and it was fine, it wasn't too much.

I called the real estate agent and put in a bid for the house. There was a bidding round, I didn't give a damn about the money, I wanted the house, and two days later it was ours. We would take it over in October.

Earlier that summer Mom's cousin Hallstein had called her to ask if I would do a reading at an event they were having, I'd said yes because I had imagined a kind of book day in the old dairy that was now an art museum opposite Mom's house, with an audience of maybe sixty or seventy. The villages around Lake Jølstravannet were small and more than twenty kilometers from Førde, the center of the district, which was no great size either.

The day before the reading arrived, I hadn't given it a lot of thought, but hours before it was supposed to begin cars started parking outside. When I put on my shoes, walked around the house and crossed the road with the book in my hand, I ran straight into a large gathering of journalists and photographers. I was greeted by TV cameras and flashes. They had been waiting for me.

"What have you spent all the money on?" one asked.

"I've bought a washing machine, a tumble dryer, a dishwasher, and a TV," I said.

Hallstein shook my hand and led me in. The room was packed.

"Do I have time for a cigarette?" I said.

"Of course," he said.

The journalists flocked around me again. More questions. Behind them came Mom, Linda, and the children crossing the road. They stood at a distance watching what was going on. The children were wide-eyed. Heidi thought I was going to sing, she said. Verdens Gang took a photo of the kids without me seeing and printed it in the paper the following day. I called Elisabeth and asked if they were allowed to do that. I couldn't do anything myself because I had written about other people and so I no longer had any rights as far as my own life was concerned. I could accept this, but I didn't like it. Elisabeth called back, she had spoken to Verdens Gang, they had promised never to use the photo again. Mom had bought the papers, wanting to see what they said, and Vanja caught sight of the photo of herself, she was angry, she looked ugly with glasses on, she said. You're the prettiest girl in the world, I said, but to no avail, her eyes narrowed and didn't light up until all thoughts of newspapers and TV dissolved in the real world down on the little beach where they swam in the water on their inflatable dolphins.

The previous evening I had done the reading and talked a little about my relationship with Jølster, where I'd written parts of all my books and which also came up in everything I'd written. While I was talking I saw Vanja standing at the back looking at me. Hallstein asked a few questions, then I signed books and walked back across the road where those members of my mother's family who were there had gathered.

It had been absurd, I had been there every summer for nigh on twenty years and no one had ever been interested in what I wrote or said, and then all of a sudden the place was bristling with cameras the second I crossed the road.

Linda and I drove up into the mountains the next day to spend the night in a cabin. The river in the middle of the valley, the mountains on either side, the white peaks under the gray sky, the water that was perhaps three kilometers away. Not a soul around, just Linda and me sitting at the table outside the cabin, the dense forest stretching upward, spruce and fir trees.

I told her about the summer before I started at the Writing Academy, when I had been in that very place for a week on my own trying to write. I told her this was where Grandpa had courted Grandma for the first time. The sun set, we sat outside the cabin chatting in the dusk, surrounded by the faint roar of the waterfall high up in the forest.

Linda had been captivated by the nature in Vestland from the first moment she ever saw it and had almost fainted at the beauty of the fjords and mountains; she had been visiting my mother to produce a radio program about the seventeenth of May. She talked about it now. They had seen porpoises in the fjord, that had been a good sign according to Mom, and they had seen deer in the forest, that had been a good sign, too. She had been pregnant with Vanja then, but hadn't known. Anfinn, who was married to Grandma's sister Alvdis, was the son of a horse dealer and as compact and powerful as a bear, and he had told her about the time when he went hunting whales and had shown her all sorts of weird and wonderful objects he had kept from those days. We had visited them every summer since, they'd been at both Vanja's and John's christenings, but that winter Anfinn had died. It was their cabin we were borrowing. I told Linda about another of Grandma's sisters, Borghild, also dead now, who had known all there was to know about everyone in the family, both those who were alive now and those who weren't. And how Tore and I had written a screenplay here and we had gone down to visit Borghild, and she stared at Tore through a magnifying glass, which made her eye enormous.

It was precisely this countryside I had described in A Time for Everything and where I had set the story of Cain and Abel and Noah. The mountains before Ålhus in Jølster and Sørbøvåg by Mount Lihesten in Ytre Sogn. My maternal grandparents were in it, and Linda's mother and Linda and Yngve and I, however all with biblical names I had taken from a family tree and no longer remembered.

I had known this landscape for as long as I could remember, but it had never been mine, I had never belonged here. Perhaps because I demanded too much from what it meant to belong. I didn't feel I belonged to Kristiansand either and although I related to the countryside on the island of Tromøya, I never felt I had the right to call it my own, we were newcomers. And I had missed that all my life, coming from one place, belonging to a place, being able to call a place home. Geir used to say the definition of home was a place where no one could deny you access. And then we used to discuss whether "Hell is home" or "Home is hell." Connecting home with a landscape and not a state of mind was my most reactionary feature, but it was also the most deeply rooted.

The following day we drove into the valley behind Mom's house with the kids, parked the car where the road ends, and walked until they couldn't take any more. We stopped, had a bite to eat and drank some coffee, and then we hiked back. They had grown up in Malmö, unused to mountains and waterfalls, yet they took it all as a matter of course, although there was also something inadequate and helpless about them as they stood beneath the immensity of the mountains and the depth of the sky.

Linda began to feel depressed again, she talked less and less, by the time we visited Jon Olav and Liv at the end of the holiday she was hardly speaking. On the way home to Malmö we dropped in on my old friend Ole and his girlfriend Brita in Bergen, I hadn't seen them since I moved to Sweden, the only thing to detract from the joy of talking to Ole again was that Linda was feeling low. But she was still a long way from how she had been. A few hours before the plane was due to depart I called for a taxi and the woman on the switchboard inquired whether I was Knausgaard, the author. I said I was and hated myself for it. The taxi was a minibus, which the children considered exciting, having it all to ourselves. At Flesland Airport people looked at me, some came over to say something about my books. One of them, a woman in her late fifties, said she'd been to all the places I had described in Sørland.

"How big Vanja and Heidi are!" she said, and laughed.

"Yes," I said.

"But I won't pester you anymore. Have a good journey home. I suppose you're going to Malmö, aren't you?"

I nodded.

"Bye," I said with a smile.

Vanja looked up at me.

"Do you know her, Dad?" she said.

"No," I said. "Never seen her before."

"But how did she know who we were?" she said.

"I've written a book about us," I said.

"You've written a book about us?" she said.

"Yes."

"What's in it?"

"All sorts of strange things," I said. "You'll have to read it when you're older."

We passed through security, people stared at us. Once through, we went to a Narvesen kiosk to buy the children something for the flight. My face was everywhere. On the new paperbacks, which I hadn't seen, Thomas's photo of my face was on the cover.

"Dad, that's you!" Heidi said, pointing.

"Oh it is. What do you know," I said.

Once home, I got back to work. Vanja would be starting school in a few weeks and had been given permission to attend the nursery school until then. We had promised her she would have her own room when she started school and as the only extra room we had was my study, I'd moved my desk and all my books into a living room. That was as far as I'd got. The room had to be painted, a desk, bed, and wardrobe needed to be bought, as well as pictures she could hang on the wall. The plan was to paint one weekend and then go to IKEA the next. Vanja was nervous it wouldn't be ready, but I assured her that everything would be ready the night before she started.

Linda's depression lifted after a few days and everything was as usual at home. She said she would take the children to school and pick them up so that I could work straight through. I was happy about that. I got up at six in the morning, went right to the living room, closed the doors, and knuckled down, barely hearing the others getting up and leaving, I surfaced to say hi to them when they returned, ate with them, and worked until ten.

Linda had a friend from Stockholm staying, they had known each other for fifteen years or so, from when Linda worked at the Stadsteater in Stockholm. Her friend was a stage director and had recently made a short film from a script Linda had written. She had her one-year-old son with her and they planned to stay for a week. Locked in the living room from morning till night, I hardly saw them. An autumn publication was still a possibility if I hit the deadline.

"She's absolutely fantastic," Linda said about her friend one evening when we had a few minutes alone. "She gets stuff done. When she decides to do something, it always happens. That's the exact opposite of me. But we can help each other. We've already come up with lots of ideas. It's wonderful having her here."

"I'm so pleased," I said.

"And you can work as much as you like at the same time," she said.

"Yes," I said. "You're generous to me. Don't you go thinking I don't realize that."

One afternoon, on my way to check my e-mails in the bedroom, I met them in the hall, they had been out shopping.

"They were all on sale," Linda said. "And I didn't buy a lot."

"Relax," I said. "I didn't say a word."

"When I'm with her," she said, nodding toward her friend, "I feel totally secure. She knows me so well. She knows exactly where the limits are, what's good or bad for me."

Her friend smiled.

"Linda charms the pants off all the shop assistants. Once I had to leave the shop, I was so embarrassed," she said.

Linda laughed.

"Was that why you left? Really?" she said, and looked at me. "Nothing expensive, nothing over the top. Would you like to see?"

"No, I can take a look later," I said, and went into my study.

The place was a mess again, the living-room floor was almost totally covered with toys, clothes, and towels, the same was true of the children's room and the hall. Of course I couldn't say anything, it was my responsibility as well, and normally I would have thought the mess can stay where it is until we have a blitz, because I had to work, I couldn't waste even a couple of hours, but when we had visitors it was different, I was ashamed of the way we lived.

I said so to Linda.

"Don't give her a thought," she said. "She's used to mess. It doesn't bother her at all. And we're working too. We have lots of plans. And they will come to fruition. She always achieves what she sets out to do. She's so good for me."

There was a tone she had that always emerged when she was on a high, but which in some way or other was more obvious now. A breezy, noncommittal tone, which brought with it an infantile side, not much, just a touch, but enough for me to find it irritating, for at these moments I wasn't in communication with her, we were not operating from the same base. Sometimes I told her, then she just smiled and said she understood what I meant and she would try to be more present. When she was growing up she always had an element of the adult child in her, the child who saw through adults and retained her composure amid their chaotic lives, I'd gathered from what she told me, but especially from what she had written, where the adult child was a recurring figure. Now she was an adult, and it was as though the opposite was happening: she wasn't assuming an adult role as a child but a child's role as an adult. Oh, it wasn't so much in evidence, only a tiny, tiny bit, something in her had stopped caring about any consequences, was no longer so careful about what was said, whether it was true or not, small dislocations of reality to make her appear funnier, grander, more entertaining. If she said something in front of the children that they shouldn't know or hear and I reproved her, she immediately corrected herself: Dad's right, that was silly of me.

I hadn't been aware of this element in her personality, I had never seen it until this spring, it suddenly emerged and it wasn't good for us because then I had to assume a role toward her, I became the person who corrected and set limits, and that was the last thing on this earth I wanted to do. There could be days, perhaps a week, when she was as light as light itself, and then it was gone from her character, like a comet leaving the firmament. Then she became "normal" again, then she became "Linda." It was easier to relate to the periods when she sank into the darkness because it didn't touch the person she was, we could communicate even though she was depressed. She was distraught that this was how she was, continually being raised to the heights and dumped back down, it made it almost impossible for her to work, for example, and forced her to go to places she didn't want to be.

I was, like Linda, pleased that she had her friend staying, she was a few years older than me, I imagined, and a responsible adult who really liked Linda and had seen enough in her life to appreciate the unusual qualities she possessed. In all the mess they had a really good time, I heard them chatting and laughing together, discussing and planning. Linda did everything with the children, trying to make up for the time when she had been so depressed she hadn't been able to do anything, I supposed.

Some slightly disturbing incidents took place. Twice Linda talked about me to her friend, she didn't know I was within earshot and would never have said what she did otherwise, the tone was confidential and the confidences were addressed to her friend not to me. Above all else I hated other people talking about me, so that was unpleasant in itself, but it wasn't disturbing. The disturbing element was that she didn't know I could hear. The first time was in the hall outside our bedroom while I was in bed on the other side of the door, actually she knew that, how could she possibly have said something in secret about me in a loud voice three meters away from where I was? The second time was similar, they went to the balcony, I was in the second living room, I heard Linda tell her friend in a loud voice to leave everything where it was, it was Karl Ove's problem. It didn't matter that she said that, it mattered that she said it as if they were completely alone. She had begun to ignore the consequences of her actions.

The next morning, when I was working in one of the living rooms, I suddenly heard a din in the other. Linda had put on a record. It was a quarter to six, and she had turned the volume up loud. "Forever Young," the old eighties hit, she was playing it at full blast at an unearthly hour.

I ran out to the stereo and turned it off.

"What are you doing? Do you know what time it is?"

She looked at me.

"Almost six. Relax. It wasn't on that loud."

She looked at me as though she were a teenager and I were the most narrow-minded middle-class parent she had ever seen. And perhaps she was right about that.

"Why are you up so early anyway? Didn't you go to bed late last night?"

"Yes. I couldn't sleep. I have so much on my mind. There are a few projects I've started. And you get angry when I lie awake and toss and turn, and then the children come in and want a glass of water or to sleep with us."

"I don't get angry. I'm asleep."

"You sleep through everything. I don't. And then you go to the kitchen to eat in the middle of the night and slam doors."

"But can't you lie down here, in the living room, at night? Alone? Then you might be able to sleep."

"The children find me anyway," she said. "They don't want you at night. Just me."

"That's not my fault, is it?" I said.

She looked at me and rolled her eyes.

"Do you know what it's like not to be able to sleep?" she said.

"No," I said. "I'm afraid I don't."

This was one of our most done-to-death topics of conversation.

"I have to work now," I said. "Couldn't you try to sleep a bit more? At least until Johnny wakes up?"

"Yes, I suppose I can," she said as though she were doing me a favor.

She went to bed late, got up early, and was still full of energy. She glowed with it. I walked past the kitchen at nine in the evening, she was sitting there with a black bowler hat on her head and wearing some clothes I had never seen before. She looked like she was in Cabaret or some musical or other. She smiled at her friend and when she noticed I was there turned to me with glittering eyes.

I went to bed and fell asleep at once, I had worked all day, then woke up to a bang, it was Linda coming in.

"Can't you be a bit quieter?" I said. "I was actually asleep."

"Can you believe this guy?" she said. "That's the best I've heard yet."

She flounced back out and slammed the door hard.

I got up and rushed after her. She was lying beside Vanja in her bed. I stopped in the doorway. She looked at me with eyes that shone white in the darkness.

"Come and lie down, Linda. I didn't mean what I said. I was asleep and woke up a bit abruptly."

"No," she said. "I'm sleeping here tonight."

"Come on. Come and sleep with me."

"No."

When I got up the next morning she was sitting in the kitchen with a cup of tea in front of her. It was five o'clock.

"Haven't you slept?" I said.

"No," she said. "I'm so tired now. I'm dying for some sleep."

"I can understand that," I said.

"I have an appointment with the doctor today," she said. "Maybe she'll give me a stronger sleeping tablet."

"Yes," I said.

"Will you come with me?"

"Is it vital?"

She looked at me.

I nodded.

"Of course I'll go with you. When is it?"

"At eleven."

"OK," I said.

We set off at a little before half past ten. In our small covered entrance she lit a cigarette, looked at me, and slowly blew out the smoke.

"Ready to go?" she said.

I nodded.

She strode out, I had to walk almost as fast as I could to keep up. Her face was determined, closed, her strides quick.

Along the pedestrian street, over the bridge, and into the little park on the right.

"I've been thinking about something," she said, lighting another cigarette. "It might be a good idea to go to the hospital just for one night. They can give me some stronger medicine. And I'd have peace and quiet there. No children. What do you think about that? It'll be like going for a health cure. I'd get food and a bed and someone would make sure I sleep."

"Is it that bad?" I asked. "Are you so tired?"

"I long for sleep so much it's unreal," she said.

"Then do it," I said. "I'm sure it'll be good."

"I think so," she said.

We were a bit early and had a coffee at a 7-Eleven nearby. She was still as determined, I was reminded of the image she often used when she wrote, she was a soldier. Black leather jacket, black jeans, black shoes. A small black backpack on her back. Wan, determined face.

"So you can just tell the children I'm sleeping at Jenny's tonight," she said.

"Yes, that's probably best," I said.

Her friend was leaving that afternoon, so it was good timing.

"I suppose we'd better go now," I said.

The doctor came out the moment we sat down in the waiting room. She radiated the same qualities she had the first time I met her. Friendliness, caring, impersonal professionalism. I was also the same, I assumed, but Linda was a very different person. Then everything had been slow, every movement an effort. Now she was bristling with energy and impatience when she sat down. Nothing could go fast enough. She started talking long before the doctor had taken a seat.

"You said there would always be someone here I could talk to," she said. "But I called and you were on holiday. And there was no one else to talk to! That's not good enough! I needed you! I really needed you!"

She began to cry.

I didn't understand a thing and looked at her, then at the doctor, who was taking notes on her pad.

"I'm very sorry about that," the doctor said. "There was a misunderstanding. You should've been given my colleague to talk to."

"That's not good enough," Linda said. "I've been so frightened."

She sobbed.

"I've been so frightened!" she repeated.

The doctor looked at her without saying anything.

"How are you?" she asked at length.

"Things are moving faster and faster," Linda said. "It's as though soon I won't be able to hang on, if you understand what I mean."

"Are you sleeping?"

"No. I hardly sleep. Can I be admitted to the hospital and have some sleeping tablets? For one night only."

The doctor nodded.

"I think that's a good idea," she said. "I can sort it out right away, so that you can go straight there, if you like."

"I just have to go home and pack first."

"Of course. But it's a good idea, Linda. I think it'll do you good."

I tried to understand what was going on as they talked. Why did she burst into tears? She hadn't said a word to me about her fears and hadn't shown any of what she was showing now.

The doctor told Linda which ward she would be in. She was given a slip of paper with the address on it. They set a new appointment, which was also put on a piece of paper.

"If there are any problems, ask them to call me," she said. "But I'll arrange everything from this end, so they know you'll be coming."

We rose to our feet, shook her hand, and went down to the street.

Linda was happy again.

"I'll come home tomorrow morning. The children won't even notice I've been away."

"That's not a problem," I said.

We hurried through the streets, she was excited, I was bewildered but in a way also reassured, perhaps because of the way the doctor had reacted to her. It had been accepted without question that she could sleep one night in the hospital and surely that was how it should be.

Linda packed a few things into a backpack, said goodbye to her friend and me, I didn't need to accompany her, she would take a taxi, then she was in the elevator with a smile on her face, and gone.

I started to clean up the apartment. Linda's friend helped me. We had never actually talked, now we did. I told her what Linda had said, about her house being a mess and how that didn't bother her. She laughed and said that was probably how Linda would have liked it to be, but she was only projecting her own desires onto her. Once Linda had visited her in Stockholm, she said, many years ago, then she had been as high as she was now, she'd taken a bath with her friend's little daughter and more or less demanded to be treated like her.

What I didn't understand was how she could accept that. She'd accepted it at the time and had accepted it here. But this clearly wasn't Linda. And I refused to give any room to what wasn't Linda. I didn't want to see it. But her friend obviously didn't have the same demands for authenticity.

We worked our way through the rooms as we talked about Linda's mother and father, me and my father. She knew something I didn't, I thought. Everything related to Linda's excesses was beyond me, it was part of the unknown, and I felt prejudiced, limited, and very, very ordinary.

When the place was clean and tidy, she packed her things, lifted up her son, who had been playing on his own while we were busy and had hardly got in our way, put him in his stroller, and headed for the train station.

It was a strange feeling to be alone. Usually I liked it, but now Linda wasn't out somewhere, she had been admitted to the hospital, and for some reason or other this made me feel lonely.

For the first time it struck me that usually I wasn't alone, I always had Linda there.

I went through the fridge, tossing out everything that had passed its sell-by date, and I did the same in the cupboards. Then I took out a bag of chicken fillets from the freezer, left them to thaw on a plate, emptied the dishwasher, and had a smoke on the balcony before going to pick up the children. It was Friday, our ice-cream day, and I took them to the café in the mall as usual.

"Mommy's not at home," I told them. "She's sleeping at Jenny's tonight."

"Why?" Vanja asked, putting the little orange plastic spoon and its heap of blue ice cream with thin red stripes into her mouth while studying me.

"She's working," I said.

"Is she coming home tomorrow?" Vanja asked.

"Yes."

"What are we doing tomorrow?"

"I don't know," I said. "What would you like to do?"

"Go to the park," Heidi said.

"No, that's boring," Vanja said.

"It is not," Heidi said.

"We can do that," I said. "But we don't need to make up our minds until tomorrow."

"Carnival," John said.

I smiled.

"You don't miss a trick, do you," I said.

"Yes, the carnival," Vanja said.

"Yes. Me too," Heidi said.

"That's decided then," I said.

After I had put them to bed the peculiar feeling of loneliness returned. I watched some TV, retired early, woke up to sounds from the kitchen, which turned out to be John banging around, he had dragged a chair to the counter, turned on the water, and filled the sink with washing-up liquid.

I made him some breakfast, saw to Heidi when she got up, and last of all Vanja. It was Saturday, their TV morning, while I sat beside them in a chair reading the newspapers. At half past seven the phone rang. It was Linda.

"How was it?" I asked.

"It was fantastic," she said. "I've never slept so well. And they've been so nice to me. There are some fantastic people here. How's it going at home?"

"Fine. When will you be home, do you think?"

"Ah, that's what I was going to tell you. The doctors here say they'd like to keep me in for one more night. To get the best possible effect. I don't think that's such a stupid idea. Then I'll be able to rest properly."

"Yes, that sounds wise," I said. "But what should I tell the children? It might seem a bit odd if you're at Jenny's for two nights and don't come home in between."

"Can't you just tell them I'm in the hospital?"

"Yeah, but then they'd want to know why."

"Tell them the truth. I'm here to get some sleep."

"OK. I'll do that."

"I love you so much, Karl Ove."

"I love you too," I said. "You enjoy the day, OK?"

"OK. Give the kids a kiss from me."

I pressed off and went in to see them. All three sat staring at the TV without taking any notice of me.

"Mommy just called," I said. "She won't be home until tomorrow."

"Why not?" Vanja said.

"You know she's been sleeping badly the past few nights, don't you? Now she's in the hospital so that she can get some help. She'll be there tonight."

"Can we visit her?"

"Well, it's only one night. She'll be home tomorrow. Let's go to the carnival, shall we?"

Folkets Park played a major role in the lives of our three children. It had a big pond, in which they splashed around and paddled during the summer and on which they skated during the winter. And a large terrarium where the parrot in the Pippi Longstocking film was spending the autumn of its life, plus a few motionless crocodiles. And a little ice-cream stall and a mini zoo with rabbits and pigs. As well as a riding center, where Vanja sat on a horse for some months of her young life, and a wonderful big playground. Not forgetting a café with a dance floor and a rock 'n' roll club. But the biggest attraction of all was the carnival. It was second rate, but the children couldn't see that and whenever we went to the park in the summer months we had to agree before starting out that there wouldn't be any discussion of the carnival today. This day was one of the few when I didn't say that. Instead I said that they could each choose three rides. If there was the slightest protest we would go home, was that understood? Yes, it was. Standing outside the entrance to the fair they would have promised me anything under the sun.

"I want to go on the mewy-go-wound!" Vanja said.

"Merrrrry-go-rrrrround," Heidi said.

Vanja flew at her, I had to grab her arms and lift her up.

"Come on, let's go for a walk and have a look around before we decide. Who wants to go on the caterpillar roller-coaster?"

"Me!" John said.

"Not me," Vanja said.

"What about the bumper cars?"

"Can I?" Vanja said.

"Yes. But you'll have to go on your own. I have to look after Heidi and John. Do you dare?"

She nodded. And immediately she drove around the oval track with an expression that was part terror and part joy. Afterward we all had a ride on the caterpillar. And then I drove one of the veteran cars on rails with John while Vanja and Heidi stood watching. Finally they got on two separate merry-go-rounds. Once that was done we walked to the playground, where they ran into two friends from class. I stood with the parents for a while, they kept an eye on the three of them while I went for a coffee, on my return we talked a bit about football, the man from one family supported Hammerby, which had sunk down the table like a lead weight after winning Allsvenskan, the Swedish premier league, the previous year. I liked him but couldn't meet his eyes, he was mentioned in Book 2 in a way that was not uncontroversial. He congratulated me on its success and I realized he had not been curious enough to read the Norwegian version anyway.

I spent half an hour trying to encourage the children to make a move homeward.

Vanja was unusually quiet.

Not far from Hemköp I found out what was bothering her.

"Why can't I say r, Dad?" she said. "After all, Heidi can. And I'm bigger than her."

"I couldn't say r when I was little either," I said.

"When did you learn then?" she said.

"At about your age," I lied.

"I don't want to start school," she said. "I want to stay in nursery school."

"Of course you do," I said. "But when you start school, you won't want to stop there either. It's the same as with nursery school. You're a big girl now."

We did some shopping, then wended our way home, they watched a film, had pizza in the evening, and then took a bath. As I was about to tuck them in a chorus for Mommy rose.

"She'll be back tomorrow," I said.

"Do you promise?" Vanja said.

"I promise," I said.

The next morning I was woken by the phone ringing. It was six o'clock, I saw, and hurried to pick it up.

"Hi, it's me," Linda said. "Good morning."

"Hi," I said.

"How's it going at home? What did you do yesterday?"

"We went to the carnival," I said.

"What are they doing now?"

"They're asleep."

"Oh, right, it's still pretty early."

"It is. How are you? When are you coming home?"

"It's going very well here. I just need a few things from home. Especially my laptop."

"I asked you when you were going to come home."

"I don't know. We're taking one day at a time."

"You're not coming back today?"

"They say I ought to stay here for another week. Then we'll see."

I said nothing.

"There's Nanna. Hi, Nanna. She's fantastic. Strict but good. Motherly. Well, you know. Solid as a rock whatever happens. She's on nights."

"Linda, are you going to be there for another week?"

"I think so. It's voluntary, though, so they can't keep me. If I want to go, I can. But it's so good for me here. It's exactly what I need. A few days of peace and quiet. It doesn't matter, does it?"

"No, of course it doesn't."

"I'm so hungry. I'm waiting for breakfast. That's why I called. I get a bit restless. If only I had my laptop, then at least I could write."

"Right," I said.

"Now they're bringing breakfast. I'll call you back. Bye, my prince."

I turned the phone off and went into the bedroom, lay down on the bed. From the children's room I heard a strange sound. A few seconds passed before I realized what it was. Someone was jerking the door handle up and down as fast as they could. I got up. Someone was knocking on the door and shouting Dad! Dad! I opened it. It was John. He had tears in his eyes.

"Couldn't you open the door?" I said.

"No!" he said.

"Come on. Let's have a little breakfast."

I was frozen inside as I sat down and watched him eat. I hadn't understood a thing. I had actually assumed she was there to sleep. Like a naïve child. I had imagined they would administer some strong medicine in slightly more controlled circumstances and she would come down from her high as soon as she'd had a good night's sleep. God knows where I'd got that idea from, but that was what I had imagined.

She had been admitted to the psychiatric hospital, she was all alone there, and I had barely considered that.

I was her husband, for Christ's sake. Her closest next of kin. I had to go there, I had to talk to the doctors, and I had to see her. Just to let her know I was there for her, for her and for the children.

What an idiot I had been.

I was utterly brain-dead.

But how could I go there? I couldn't take the children with me. Obviously that wouldn't work. And I didn't know anyone in town who could take care of them. Or yes, I did, but they had their own kids to look after. And I didn't want to ask anything of anyone.

John had lost interest in food, now he was pushing a cornflake through a pool of milk on the wax cloth.

"Are you full?" I said.

"Yes," he said. "Thank you."

"You're going to do well, with such wonderful manners," I said, lifting him out of the chair. Removed his diaper and threw it into the bin under the sink. "Do you want to be in the buff for a while?"

He nodded and trotted off into the living room. I found the children's channel on the TV, went into the other living room and phoned Linda.

She answered at once.

"Hi, Hem," she said.

She used to say that because hem, Swedish for home, came up on her phone whenever I rang.

"Hi," I said. "I should've been up there to see you by now, to talk to the doctors and so on, but now I'm wondering whether it would be all right if I came early tomorrow morning. Right after dropping the kids off."

"Yes, of course," she said. "They'll be pleased to meet you. I've told everyone what a wonderfully handsome husband I have."

"I'm sorry about all of this, Linda."

"There's nothing to be sorry about. I'm absolutely fine. It's like being in a mountain hotel. And I get proper sleeping tablets. I pass out like a clubbed seal."

"That's good. You have to sleep and rest. I'll see you tomorrow. Call me if you feel like it. I'll take my cell if we go anywhere."

The chill in my guts didn't leave me that day, it returned at regular intervals.

I was Linda's closest relative, I was her husband, and she was alone in a psychiatric hospital and I hadn't lifted a finger to help her. She had been there for two days now. With no help, no support, all on her own.

As soon as Vanja got up, she asked me when Mommy was coming home.

"She just called. She said she has to stay in the hospital for a while yet."

"But you promised!"

"I know. But she's there to sleep the right way. Do you remember when she was so tired this spring and slept all the time? Now it's the opposite, now she can't sleep at all. It's not a problem, but she has to be there for a few more days. But do you know what?"

"What?"

"We'll visit her in the hospital tomorrow. That'll be nice."

"Is that definite?"

"Yes, of course."

After I had dropped off the children at school the next morning, I walked the few hundred meters to the big hospital complex. I had been there only once before, that was when John was born, almost three years ago to the day. Then I'd rushed home to get Vanja and Heidi, and they had laughed and fooled around in the hotel room for relatives, patted John's head and placed a rubber dinosaur on top of it, which I took photos of, and they remembered for that very reason.

Linda had given me directions, which I'd written down on a Post-it. It was a long block reminiscent of the sixties, right at the end of the complex. I walked in, took the elevator up, and rang the bell outside the door, which was locked. While I was waiting a woman came down the stairs. She looked at me.

"Aren't you a writer?" she said.

"Yes," I said.

"You wrote Min kamp, didn't you? Imagine seeing you here."

"Yes," I said. "Nice to meet you."

The door opened, a nurse stared at me. She was wearing a white uniform.

"Hi," I said. "My name's Karl Ove Knausgaard. I'd like to visit Linda."

"Hi," she said. "Come with me. She's over here."

I followed her down the colorless corridor.

I had worked in a ward like this when I was eighteen, and I recognized the style. A refectory, a cage-like office with a big window, a recreation room, a long corridor with doors on both sides. Gray linoleum floor. Furniture with the unmistakable imprint of institution.

Four or five patients sat watching TV. Trembling, taciturn, pale. A couple paced to and fro, filled with a nervous, restless, aggressive energy. They were young; the ones watching TV were middle-aged and old. Linda came out of one room. She lit up when she saw me, gave me a big hug and a kiss on the lips.

"This is my husband!" she said loudly to everyone there.

"Well, you do have a handsome man, Linda!" a lively old lady called out.

"He's the best writer in Norway," Linda said. "It's absolutely true."

The patients sitting there, disabled or slumped, all with dark, vacant eyes, looked across at us.

"You should see my room," Linda said. "It's so cozy."

She led me into a room. There were two beds, on one sat an overweight woman; she got up as soon as she saw us and left. Linda said her name and smiled.

"This is where I live," she said, extending her arms. "But I need a few things from home. I've written a list. Or perhaps you can bring them with you next time? Look there!" she said, pointing to the wall where two drawings hung.

"Two twins drew them," she said. "They remind me of myself when I was young. They're twenty at most. Princesses of the night. They don't sleep either. They're acrobats. They're absolutely terrific."

She pressed against me.

"Isn't it cozy here?" she said.

"Yes," I said, taking a step toward the window. "But I was going to talk to the senior nurse. Don't you think it would be best to do that right away?"

"They'll come and get you," she said, patting the duvet. "Sit down."

I sat down beside her. She put her arm around me and wanted to kiss me. I leaned away.

"I'm not in the mood."

"Never mind," she said. "I understand. Look here."

She got up and took me by the hand to the window. She wanted me to see all the ornaments on the windowsill. Porcelain dogs, porcelain cats. A photo of Vanja, Heidi, and John. A Robyn CD, stood upright to show the cover, some stones, some toy rings.

"And that's my cuddly toy. A Moomin. I cover him with the duvet every night before I go to bed."

She pointed to a little box on the floor where a cloth figure lay.

There was a knock at the door. The same nurse who had opened the door for me escorted us to the office. There were four people inside. Linda and I sat down on chairs between them. The doctor responsible for Linda, as far as I could judge, wearing a brown suit, extremely jovial, asked her some questions in broken Swedish. One of the others was also dressed in normal clothes, the remaining two wore white uniforms. Linda answered all the questions with wit, in detail, and at great length. They smiled, all of them, I could see she was a kind of favorite.

"There's just one thing I have to say," Linda said. "I know this won't sound good because it'll give the impression that I'm an elitist, or something like that, but if you ask me how I'm getting on it's an inescapable fact that some of the nurses in the ward are so . . . well, I'll have to be careful now, but they're a bit on the slow side, they don't always understand things right away, and that can be wearing for me. I'm a writer, I do radio, I'm a professional woman, and I'm used to a certain level, if you see what I mean. But there's practically no one to talk to here."

I felt a strong urge to duck, I didn't, I retained my composure and watched her as she spoke.

"It is as it is, Linda," the doctor said. "But now your husband's here. He may have a few questions to ask. Do you?"

"Two," I said. "And they're of a practical nature. We have three children.

They have to see Linda of course. How shall we do it? I'm not so keen for them to come here."

"You could meet in the park," the doctor suggested. "That would be all right, wouldn't it? Otherwise there's nothing to stop you, Linda, going out every other day, or every day, and going home. Perhaps not today, perhaps not tomorrow, but in the foreseeable future."

"And that's my second question. How long is she going to be here, do you think?"

I looked at Linda as I said that, it didn't feel good to refer to her as "she," but I couldn't find a way around it. She just smiled as if to say, Look what a clever husband I have.

"It's impossible to say, my dear man," the doctor said, getting up. "But we'd like to stabilize you a bit, Linda, before you go home."

"The medicine isn't working," Linda said, looking at me. "From what I understand I'm being given big doses, but they're not working at all."

"Well, there's a lot of energy in you."

"OK," I said. "We're not talking days then?"

"Probably not," the doctor said. "Now I'm going on holiday, so there'll be another doctor coming tomorrow. But she's even better than me, so that won't be a problem."

"Are you going on holiday?" Linda asked.

"Yes," he said.

"And just as I was beginning to like you," she said.

He laughed, shook hands, and the whole entourage followed him out.

"I wanted to talk to you," the senior nurse said. "Could you come to my office for a moment?"

"Yes, of course," I said, looking at Linda.

"I'll wait in the room," she said.

I accompanied her to the office.

"Do you need any help?" she said. "You have a right to some social help. Someone could go to your house, do the shopping, cook and clean for you."

"No," I said. "No, no, no. I don't need it. Absolutely not. I'm fine."

"OK," she said. "If you should change your mind, let me know. How's it going with the children?"

"Fine."

"Do they know she's here?"

"Sort of. We've told them she's in the hospital to sleep."

"OK. I think it's a good idea for you to take them to the park and meet Linda there, as we mentioned."

"Is today OK? Actually I've promised them they would see her today."

"That's fine. Come here after school. When do you pick them up?"

"At three. No, I'm wrong, half past three. So if we say a quarter to four here?"

"I'll make sure she's waiting at the entrance."

"Thank you," I said, and went to Linda's room, knocked, and opened the door. Linda came toward me and took my hand, pulled me to the bed.

"What do you think of the doctor? Isn't he great? Eastern European. Hungarian or Romanian or something like that. Shame he's going on holiday. Typical."

She looked at me. I bit my lip to stop myself from crying, got up, and stood in front of the window.

"Karl Ove, shall we go out for a cigarette?" she said.

"Sure," I said. "OK."

"They've got coffee here. Visitors have to pay five kronor, but I'll see if I can get you a free one."

"I don't mind paying," I said.

She filled two cups, poured milk in one, called for a nurse.

"We're going out for a cigarette," she said. "Open up, open up."

We walked along the corridor with him, to the opposite end of the building from where I had arrived, he unlocked the door and we took the elevator down, came to a paved area with a shed where two old men were smoking.

Linda stopped and lit up. I did too.

"I'm so happy to be with you," she said. "You make me so happy, Karl Ove."

She stood up on her toes and we kissed. She clung to me, I took a step back, she let go, glancing down the road to where a vehicle was coming.

"I'm well looked after here," she said. "Don't you think?"

"Yes," I said. "But you mustn't stay too long."

"No," she said.

An ambulance drove slowly past.

"They're in and out all night," she said. "It's exciting."

"Mm," I said.

I watched the ambulance, she held my face and straightened it as if to say I had to look at her.

Our eyes met. She stretched up and kissed me.

"I'll have to go soon," I said.

"Yes, I know you have a lot to do," she said.

"But we'll see you this afternoon," I said. "I'll bring the children and we can meet outside."

"It's nice sitting in the park," she said.

"We can buy ice cream," I said.

"Yes!" she said.

"Bye," I said.

"Bye," she said.

As I turned I welled up. I cried all the way home, almost blinded by tears, but when I was at home, sitting on the balcony and smoking, my eyes were dry. A situation had arisen and it had to be dealt with.

I was booked to do a four-day reading tour around Gothenburg, I would have to cancel that. I had lots of gigs at the Oslo Book Festival, I would have to cancel them. I had two spots at the Louisiana Literature Festival, I would have to cancel them. And then I would have to call Ingrid and Mom and ask if they could come to stay for a while, not because I needed any help, but because I wanted the children to have someone else apart from me. Anything that would divert attention from Linda's absence was good.

I went inside and called Ingrid. I told her how the land lay, that Linda was ill and I would have to cancel everything for the next few weeks.

"It wouldn't be possible to arrange to do all the jobs on one day and organize a babysitter for that day?"

"Yes," I said. "That should work."

I e-mailed Stefan at Nordstedts and asked if he could cancel the arrangements I had. No problem. I e-mailed the organizer in Gothenburg and said I would have to cancel the tour. They e-mailed back and said it was fine, but couldn't I make one of the days, the one in Gothenburg? They had already advertised it and would prefer not to cancel. I wrote back and said that was fine. I didn't contact Louisiana, in fact I wanted to do that one, and Copenhagen was so close I could travel back in the evening.

I called Ingrid again, she was happy to come and help, but not before the end of the week. I called Mom, she would manage to get away somehow and come down too, but probably not before the following week.

Heidi ran toward me as I entered the gates to the school.

"Are we going to see Mommy?" she shouted.

"Yes, we are," I said.

John saw me, pulled himself off the wooden tricycle, and ran over too.

I lifted him up, put him down, and turned to the staff.

"How has it been today?" I said.

"It's been fine. The older children have been to the theater."

"Oh that's right," I said.

"John slept for an hour, more or less. But it was almost impossible to wake him today."

"He gets up very early," I said.

Vanja was on the swing with Katinka. I walked over to them. Heidi came along, holding my hand.

"We're going to see Mommy!" she cried.

"I know," Vanja said.

"Are you coming?" I said.

"I just have to get a drawing," she said, and ran inside.

I put John in the stroller in the meantime. I wondered what she had drawn. When Linda had been depressed Vanja had drawn a little girl and a mother with a heart between them and written, "I love you, Mama." This time it was a house with a tree beside it and a flower bed, drawn in the way I remembered from my own childhood.

We walked up to Södervärn and into the hospital complex. Vanja had been there several times before, to see the optician, and had positive associations with the place.

"Where's she staying?" Heidi said.

"Over there," I said.

"Do they sleep here?" Heidi said.

"Yes, they do."

"Are there lots of people who can't sleep?" Vanja said.

"Not so many," I said. "But there are some."

Linda was leaning against the wall beside the door. When Vanja and Heidi caught sight of her they set off at a run. I lifted John from the stroller so that he could chase after them.

"My children," Linda said, and bent down to embrace all three of them. "Vanja, Heidi, and John. How I've missed you!"

Linda straightened up and looked at me.

"Hi," she said. "Shall we go and get some ice cream?"

I nodded, and we set off. There were buildings on both sides of the road, but behind the psychiatric department there was a lawn. We walked past, turned left, at the end of the road there was a kiosk.

"What have you been doing today?" Linda said.

"We've been to the theater," Vanja said.

"Not me," Heidi said. "I was at school all day."

"You're so lovely," Linda said.

"Why can't you sleep, Mommy?" Vanja said.

"I don't know," Linda said. "But it's not serious. Look, there's the kiosk."

She opened the door and went in. As soon as her attention wandered from the children her face assumed an extremely distant expression. I could see she wanted to be somewhere else. She wanted to be with the children, but when they were there, she wanted to be somewhere else.

She bent down to them as they stood by the chest freezer.

"I want a Daim," Vanja said.

John pointed to a cone. Heidi to a tub.

She took the three ice creams, placed them on the counter and paid.

Then we moved on. It was as though Linda was holding back almost everything she had inside her. I could see the glow in her eyes, but the children noticed nothing, I could see that too. We sat down on a bench by a little pool at the other end of the hospital complex. The children sat beside us eating their ice cream. When they'd finished they played by the water's edge, John carried over a big branch he had found, which he threw in. Heidi crawled onto Linda's lap, she sat caressing her and staring into the distance.

"I want to sit on your lap too," Vanja said. Linda put Heidi down and lifted Vanja. Usually this would have led to a spat, but not today.

I moved to another bench and had a smoke. After I'd finished the cigarette I got up and put the ice-cream wrappers into a nearby bin.

"We have to go now," I said.

"Has it been half an hour?" Linda said.

I nodded.

She got up, I put John in the stroller, and then we set off.

"My room's up there," Linda said, pointing to the top of the long building.

"Is it nice?" Heidi said.

"Yes, it is," Linda said. "It's really nice."

"Can we see it?"

"I don't think they allow any children up there," I said. "It has to be very quiet."

"That's true," Linda said. "Perhaps it's better if I meet you at home."

"How long are you going to be here?" Vanja said.

"I don't know," Linda said. "But I'll see you tomorrow."

"Bye, Mommy," Vanja and Heidi said.

The following day I arranged with the senior nurse for Linda to come home for an hour. She wasn't allowed to walk on her own, so I dressed the kids and we went to pick her up. As on the previous occasion, she was waiting outside the ward. She was heavily made-up. And a little unsteady on her legs, so I supported her with one arm and pushed the stroller with the other. Must be the medicine, I thought. She had such energy, they had said, medicines were ineffective against her mania, and they were giving her as much as they could. The children were chatting away as usual as we walked, past the big building site which would be the new underground train station – where people cycled and walked over the gravel-covered asphalt along the wire-netting fence after a day's work – past the end of the hotel first, then the side, across the road, through the door, and up and into the elevator.

Linda watched children's TV with them for a few minutes. She had John on her lap, with Vanja and Heidi snuggled up beside her. I made the simplest meal I knew, spaghetti and meatballs. After a little while Linda came out and headed for the hall. I thought she was going to the toilet, but she opened the door to the bedroom.

When the food was almost ready I looked in on her.

She was sitting in front of her laptop writing on Facebook.

"You've only got forty minutes left," I said. "Can't you stay with the children?"

"Soon," she said. "Just doing this."

I returned to the kitchen. Soon afterward she walked into the hall. I heard the balcony door open and close. I set the table, filled a water jug, cut some tomatoes into boats and placed four on each plate. I tipped the meatballs into a bowl, poured water into glasses, and emptied the spaghetti into a dish.

"Food's up!" I shouted.

No one moved.

I made a beeline for the TV and switched it off. The children followed me into the kitchen and sat down. I went to the balcony, where Linda was sitting with her feet on the balustrade smoking.

"Food's ready," I said.

"Coming!" she said.

As we ate she spoke to Vanja, Heidi, and John as she always did. I could see she had to pull herself together to do so and radiated a nervousness and desperation when the conversation flagged.

After the meal we all went into the living room. The children snuggled up to Linda, she put her arms around Vanja and Heidi and had John on her lap. But her eyes were frantic. She put John down on the floor and got to her feet.

"Where are you going, Mommy?" Heidi said.

"To the bathroom," she said.

She didn't come back, and I strode out to see what she was doing. She was writing on Facebook.

"We have to go now," I said. "It'll take a bit to dress them and so on. And you have to be back by seven."

"You don't need to accompany me," she said. "It's absolutely unnecessary. How far is it? A kilometer? Not even that. I can do it on my own."

"But they said you shouldn't walk on your own. They expressly said I had to be with you."

"That's just standard procedure," she said. "A rule for people who really can't look after themselves. I can. I'll walk back on my own so that you and the children can stay here."

"OK," I said. "Let's do that then."

I went into the living room.

"Come and say goodbye to Mommy," I said.

John slipped off the sofa and ran into the hall. Heidi followed.

"Vanja?"

"Bye, Mom!" she shouted.

Linda bent down and hugged Heidi and John. With an unsteady step and a bag hanging off her shoulder, she walked into the living room, where she leaned forward and kissed Vanja on the head.

When she opened the elevator door she looked at me and winked, kissed her fingertips and blew me a kiss.

At just after nine the hospital rang.

A nurse introduced herself and asked me if I was Linda's husband. I confirmed that I was.

"Is she with you now?" the nurse asked.

"Linda? No. She left for the hospital two hours ago. Hasn't she arrived?"

"No. But didn't you accompany her? That was the deal we made, wasn't it?"

"Yes, it was. But she seemed so centered. And we don't live that far away."

"She'll be refused any leave if the rules aren't adhered to."

"I understand."

"Now you know," she said.

"Yes," I said.

I hung up and called Linda's mobile. It wasn't on. I tried again a little later, and since it was still off then as well, I went to bed.

The next morning I called her ward. Linda was there. She had arrived at around midnight, the nurse said. She called Linda, and Linda came to the phone.

"Hi," I said.

"Hi," she said. "I've got a new nurse. You should meet him. Turns out he's read Mein Kampf. Hitler's, that is. I think he does martial arts and has a combat dog. But he's nice. I think he might become a good friend here."

"Linda," I said. "Yesterday you were supposed to go straight back to your ward."

"Oh that," she said. "I've already discussed that with the nurse. I just wanted to go out for a little walk. Nothing dangerous. I'm here of my own accord, you know. They can't actually stop me."

"Where did you go?"

"Møllevangen. Around there. Are you going to visit me afterwards?"

"Yes, after I've taken them to school."

"Good! It'll be good to see you again. Could you bring some money with you? I've run out."

"OK," I said. "Will do."

I rang the doorbell upstairs in the gray building. A young nurse opened up. We shook hands, I followed her in. Linda was sitting at a table in the dining room with a bearded man around thirty years old. I realized this was the man she had been speaking about. She stood up beaming with pleasure when she saw me, came over, and put her arms around me.

"This is Mats," she said. "I suppose you two have a lot to talk about."

"Hi," I said, shaking his hand.

"Hi," he said, and he must have noticed my obvious lack of interest because the first thing he said was that he had to go and do something.

We went into her room. The ornaments on the windowsill had multiplied. The photos of the children she had brought with her when she first came suggested she'd known her stay wouldn't be for one night. No one else had thought that except for me. Me and the children.

She talked about nurses and patients as though they were people she had known for many years. She talked about the ward as though it were a romantic sanatorium in a Thomas Mann novel. She talked about all her plans, everything she was going to do, and showed me a notebook in which she had already written quite a number of pages.

"What was it like being at home yesterday?" I said.

"It was great to see the children," she said. "But I can't manage so much all at once. There's something in me that wanders off. There are such strong forces in me and I can't resist them."

"You were wonderful with the children, Linda. It makes me so happy. I can see how much it takes out of you. But you have to carry on doing it. Do you think you can?"

She nodded.

"Are you coming here this afternoon?"

"Yes. Let's do what we did last time."

"Do you have any money on you?"

"Yes, but not very much. Two hundred. Is that enough?"

"No, not really. But I'll take it. Shall we go and have a smoke?"

We stood outside for ten minutes smoking, Linda found it impossible to stand still, I saw that she could hardly wait for me to go.

"See you later then," I said.

"Yes, see you," she said, and turned to two other patients standing there as I set off. At home I took my bike out of the cellar, it was a DBS I'd chosen from a selection of probably better bikes, only because the name reminded me of my childhood, the spring light, the smell of the sea between the spruce trees. I cycled to Flüggers Färg on Köbenhavnervägen and bought some paint, brushes, and foam rollers. When I got home I put the first coat on Vanja's room while crying so much I could barely see the wall. I painted three of the walls light blue, as Vanja had wanted, and the fourth white. Then I painted the long wall in what would soon be Heidi and John's room light green. That had been Heidi's suggestion. I cleaned the brushes and rollers, called Linda and asked how she was doing, she said very well, but she was bored. I said that was the point of being there, she was supposed to get bored and not do so much. She said she knew.

After the brief conversation I went to the balcony, surrounded by the sounds of the city and the warm August air, I inhaled the smoke into my lungs and thought about what was happening to Linda. It was clear she had complete awareness of herself, she agreed to everything I said to give me the impression she was closer to me than she was in reality: as soon as I was out of sight she changed direction and wandered into town. She would say she loved me, but as soon as I was there she felt an obligation she couldn't deal with, because it tied her and it was these bonds she was fleeing.

She had been as low as it was possible for any human to be, she'd been unable to articulate this and was overcome with thoughts of death, an unbearable state that lasted for weeks. It was obvious she wouldn't be able to control the light inside her afterwards, which made everything easy and good, but she had to follow it because beneath the light, at the end of the wave carrying her further and further upward, was the darkness. She knew that. Once she had told me that a nurse had said to her during a manic spell, Remember that really you are sad. But what was the "really" and the "not really" in this? What was Linda, what was depression, what was manic?

That afternoon Vanja came rushing up to me as I opened the nursery school gate.

"Dad! Dad! I can say r!" she shouted.

"Wow," I said. "Is that true?"

"Rrrrrrrrrrrrrr," she said. "Crown prince!"

"How did you do that?"

"I don't know. I just did."

She had tried to make a kind of gurgling Skåne r at the back of her throat without success, and she had tried a tip-of-the-tongue r, which sounded like a whistle, closer to th than r, the one I'd had to use until I was sixteen, which had deeply shamed me.

Now she had suddenly succeeded.

"Absolutely wonderful, Vanja," I said. "And just as you're starting school!"

I didn't say anything about the painting I had done, I wanted to surprise them. They were really pleased, especially Heidi, she lit up when she saw the room. Vanja, as usual, was a thought ahead.

"I'd like a picture of a dog on that wall," she said.

"Yes," I said. "Tomorrow I'll do a second coat and when it's dry we can buy some pictures."

"I'd like one of a cat," Heidi said.

Painting their rooms felt as if I was betraying Linda because it was an unconditional blessing, and I had no right to it, something good was happening here while she was in need, it was like going behind her back. Yet I had to do it for my own sake, it was an obvious compensation, and for the children's sake, who had to be kept as far away as possible from Linda's needs.

On the way home from school we stopped by a picture-framing shop. Vanja chose three pictures of a dog, Heidi chose one of a cat and one of Babar in a red plane, and then I chose a motif from Tove Jansson's Who Will Comfort Toffle?: Snufkin under a blue sky. We hung up the pictures, had something to eat, and set off to get Linda from the hospital. She swayed a little as she walked and seemed exhausted, spent. At home we watched kids' TV, she saw half the program before going to her bedroom, checking her e-mails, and logging on to Facebook. Afterwards she went to the balcony for a smoke. When she came back in, we had to go. She rushed to pack her things, the children put on their shoes rather reluctantly, and then we set off for the hospital, John in the stroller, Vanja and Heidi on either side, Linda at the front. She gave them a hug each, and when she straightened up I saw her eyes were moist. We said goodnight and walked home.

The following morning we had another meeting with the doctor. Linda put on another show, she was charming, lively, made everyone laugh. She showed great self-awareness and joked about her manic state. She just wanted everything to move faster. Faster, faster, faster. She couldn't sit still, she couldn't stay on the same topic, had to interrupt, intercede with something new. If I said anything she stared at me impatiently, finished my sentences for me, knew what I was going to say long before I said it, presumably also before I knew it myself. In that sense she was brilliant, in an elevated state, special to her, magnificent. But the fact that she didn't care about what lay beneath, the slowness and the dull-wittedness, the sluggishness and the ugliness, or didn't want to see it, meant her brilliance was a cover-up and became a place for herself, the only place she could bear to be. Thoughts of the children belonged there and perhaps also of me. But when she was with the children these two levels conflicted and it was intolerable for her, I saw how she had to fight to keep everything together when we visited her. Everything in her personality was in turmoil, her ten-year-old self could manifest itself, her teenage self could manifest itself, her erotic self, which was usually hidden and only revealed itself to me, could manifest itself, her boundless star-spangled poet self could manifest itself, her boastful, excessive self could manifest itself, for her personality was no longer under control, there was nothing to keep the various elements in check, the center had lost its hold, her manic forces hurled everything out, she wanted to rise, everything in her wanted to rise, and she rose higher and higher while becoming more and more exhausted. In all of this, the rising higher, the light that caused her to rise, there was one thing she never rose above, and that was her commitment to her children.

A lot became clear to me during these days. What Linda dreamed of was to live a perfectly ordinary life with a perfectly ordinary family. To have an ordinary job, go to the cabin on the weekends and work in the garden with the children running around her. But she was no ordinary person. She was the least ordinary person I had ever met. During all the years of childbearing, breastfeeding, and having little ones she had fought. Her struggle had been very different from mine; hers had been life or death. I had written that I was living an inauthentic life, I was living the life of someone else, and I might well have been, and this tormented me, but it didn't threaten me. It did threaten Linda. Her whole personality, the one I had settled down with, and her whole language had been erased in the life we'd lived. That wasn't the case with me. I had written, I'd had my language and, not least, my distance. She hadn't had any such distance until now, rising above all the ties and obligations and wanting to be utterly free. But the freedom was false, the freedom was a deception, the freedom was a circus in daylight. She saw it perhaps as glittering lights, she saw it perhaps as magical, but when I looked at her what I saw was the exhaustion, the unsteadiness on her feet, the worthless, the false, the hospital tristesse, all the people who had no hope and therefore had nothing.

I informed the staff at the nursery school that Linda had been admitted to the hospital and we had told the children she was there to sleep. They said they hadn't noticed any changes in the kids, they were as they always were. One of the staff said that our children had strong personalities. But no one adapts as quickly as children, and for them it was nothing special that their mother was in the hospital to sleep and they visited her every afternoon. They treated the subject of sleep as the most natural thing in the world, at first they had lots of questions, what did they actually do in the hospital, gradually their curiosity waned, that was how it was.

The school staff told me just to ask if I required any assistance. Also the parents we knew and had told that Linda was ill offered their help. It wasn't necessary, I said, and this was true, apart from one afternoon when I was going to Gothenburg to do a reading and needed a babysitter. A woman at the nursery scool was happy to lend a hand, so after I'd taken the children there, visited Linda at the hospital, and made a sausage stew for the evening meal, I caught the train north. The babysitter brought them home, fed them, put them to bed, and was sitting up for me when I returned at midnight, a bit annoyed that I'd arrived two hours later than I'd said, which I attempted to compensate for by paying especially well. If I had said how late it would be she might not have wanted the job, I had thought.

I had read a passage from the first novel, about inauthentic life, how I could lose my temper with the children and shake them, almost completely out of control. The moment I began to read I realized it was a mistake. I could sense what people were thinking, that no child should be treated like that, and I was a bad father who thought I was better just because I admitted how bad I was, I was seeking absolution in literature. Fortunately I was able to leave the event as soon as I'd done the reading, disappear into a waiting taxi and then a train compartment.

On the way back home, the real estate agent called. Not a nibble yet. We agreed to drop the price even further. I could hear that she too was heartily sick of the cabin.

In the midst of all this John's third birthday loomed. Both Vanja and Heidi had been allowed to have parties with guests from the start, while up to then John had been forced to celebrate with us. He hadn't known any different when he was one or two, but now that he was three I had been wondering for a while whether to invite some children over from the nursery school, to give him a party, but I came to the conclusion this was far too ambitious. Instead he would celebrate it at school in the usual way, with one of the parents bringing a cake and making a fruit salad, and then at home with cake and presents after the evening meal. Linda wanted to join us at the school, she had asked the doctor, who had said it was fine. I was not convinced it was a good idea. There was a shrill side to her now, which came out in social situations, and I was not keen for Heidi and John to see it.

She rang the doorbell of the apartment at eleven.

She'd had a haircut and dyed her hair black. She wore heavy green eye shadow, a red skirt, purple tights, and high heels. She was smiling, but looked utterly drained.

"What do you think of my Frida Kahlo look?" she said.

"You look good," I said.

"Shall we go and get some cake? And fruit?" she said.

"Can we have a cup of coffee first?" I said.

"Yes, of course," she said.

I wondered how to tell her. After seeing her, I knew there was absolutely no question of her organizing the birthday at the school.

"How are you?" I said.

"I'm very well. A bit tired though maybe."

On one wrist she had an enormous watch.

"You bought yourself a new watch?" I said.

"Yes! I took the biggest they had to remind myself to be punctual. Otherwise I can't handle it. They get so angry with me then."

"And the green strap?" I said, nodding toward her wrist.

"That's to symbolize that I'm totally free. Whenever I look at it I think about it. About being completely free."

"Very nice," I said. "Mm, Linda?"

"Yes?"

"It might be best if you don't go to the school. It'll be very intense, you know. And what you need is peace and quiet. It's much better if I go, and then you can come in the afternoon and celebrate at home. What do you think?"

"Yes, it'd be wonderful not to have to go," she said.

"That's good to hear," I said.

"But can I buy him some presents? I can do that, can't I?"

"Of course. We can do it together."

"Actually I've discussed everything with Jenny."

"OK."

She was back after a couple of hours, several bags in hand.

"There might be too many, but they're lovely," she said. "And I've bought something for the girls too."

"Good," I said. "I'll put them in the closet. Would you like a cup of coffee?"

"No, Jenny's waiting downstairs. See you this afternoon."

She came and we decided to skip the meal, John wanted to go straight to the cake. I lit the candles, we sang for him, the girls stood on their chairs, as they did at school. He blew out the candles. We ate cake, they were each given a present, and then John got the rest of his in the living room. Linda came in with a flurry of packets, ribbons, and plastic bags, she sat down with him and helped him to open them. Suddenly, in the middle of unpacking a large present, she got up and went to the balcony.

"Mama!" John cried. "Help me!"

I sat down with him. Luckily he accepted that, and we unpacked the present and opened the box it was in. Linda moved to the bedroom and logged on to Facebook, she was writing when I entered.

"It's gone very well," I said.

"I couldn't stand any more," she said. "I can only take a little at a time."

"I know, but that's enough."

She didn't look at me, her fingers clattered across the keyboard.

"I think it's time to go," I said.

"Yes," she said. "I just have to finish this."

Afterwards she stood up and went into the hall.

"It's John's birthday," she said. "It doesn't feel right that they have to come with me. Couldn't you just stay here and carry on with the birthday?"

"Do you remember what happened last time?"

"Yes, yes. But I'm not there now. I'll go straight to the hospital. I promise. I can't risk not being able to go out."

"Are you sure?" I said.

"Absolutely," she said.

"OK," I said.

She looked at me.

"It's always struck me that I was a sailor's wife. You went to sea and left me on my own. But now it's the other way around. Now I'm the sailor."

She laughed.

I laughed too because she was wearing her striped sweater and did a sailor's salute.

We kissed. She pressed against me, breathed in my ear, I wrestled myself free.

"Not now," I said.

"I know," she said. "Now I'm casting my moorings."

And then she was gone.

A few hours later they called from the hospital and asked if Linda was at home. I apologized, saying it had been impossible to accompany her because of the children, and I had taken a risk.

The following day I asked her what she had done. She said she had just drifted around a little. Been to a few bars, talked to people. One man she had spoken to, my age, visited her just before I arrived later that week. She said they were good friends. I had never seen or heard of him. The same applied to many others, suddenly she had a large circle of acquaintances in Malmö. That evening she was refused permission to go out, so we visited her in the park, where she was composed again, a long way from the impatient, restless teenager she had been the evening before. Ingrid came down from Stockholm; the first thing she did was visit Linda. We talked about it on her return.

"The children come first," Ingrid said. "They're the most important. They're the top priority."

"I agree," I said.

"It was like that when her father became ill. The children came first, whatever happened."

The Saturday before school started I took Vanja with me to IKEA. We bought a bed, a desk, a wardrobe, and a chest of drawers. On Sunday we bought a satchel, a pencil case, and new clothes. I assembled all the furniture, apart from the drawers, after they had gone to bed because I got so angry with do-it-yourself kits that I might have taken my annoyance out on the children if they were around.

Early on Monday morning Linda came home to be there on Vanja's first day of school. I was apprehensive about her appearance, hoping she wouldn't turn up in green eye shadow and purple tights, but she didn't, she wore a simple flowery dress and had taken care with her makeup, which, apart from the red lipstick, was neutral.

I took a photo outside the front entrance to the building, exactly as someone, presumably my mother, had done with me, outside our house, on my first day of school.

We took John and Heidi to the nursery and then we walked the last stretch to the school with Vanja. She held Linda's hand and mine. She was a little afraid, I sensed, but also full of excitement.

The atmosphere in the classroom was as I remembered from all my first days. Half formal, half uncertain. Linda talked to the teacher and other parents. Vanja stood with her best friend and stared at the other children. When the teacher called them and they had to sit on a carpet in the middle of the floor, she was undaunted, she had her friend behind her.

Linda and I sat next to each other looking at Vanja in the middle of this group of children. After half an hour Linda leaned toward me and whispered she had to go. I nodded. We agreed to meet at the little café by Möllan. Only twenty minutes later it was over as far as the parents were concerned, and I walked to the café, where Linda talked and talked and could finally go wherever her mind led her.

Toward the end of the week I was due to go to the Louisiana Museum of Modern Art. After taking the children to the school, I rented a car and drove over the bridge to Denmark. The weather was magnificent. Sun, high blue sky, Indian summer. I sat outside the boathouse by the sea drinking coffee and smoking and chatting to the other authors, among them Tomas Espedal, who had shown such heart and defended me in Bergens Tidende, and Dag Solstad and Tua Forsström, the Finnish poet, who turned out to be a warm, generous person. There was a full house, two hundred people, and when it was over I drove back in the darkness and went to bed in a quiet apartment where everyone was asleep. The next day I did exactly the same. Linda was worried while I was away, even if it was only for the day, at the same time she told everyone I had to go to Denmark to appear at Louisiana.

The doctors suggested electric-shock therapy. They called it by a different name, but that is what it was. They wanted to halt the mania in its tracks. She was given an appointment, but when the time came she didn't turn up. She was frightened, I understood that, she didn't want it.

One afternoon she came with me to pick up the children. First Heidi and John, who we took with us to Vanja's school. Her classmates were in the schoolyard, but Vanja was nowhere to be seen.

"I'll go behind there and look for her," I said.

Linda nodded.

In a corner, barely visible, she stood with her friend, clapping their hands against each other's and singing.

"Come on, Vanja," I said.

Both of them came and we walked over to the others. Linda was speaking with one of the teachers, with Heidi clinging to her leg.

"Where's John?" I said.

"I don't know," Linda said. "I'm not responsible for them now."

Again and again I misjudged her.

I looked around. No John. I ran to the back of the school. There, by the playground equipment, he was staring at the bigger children. I lifted him up and took him back with me, and we all walked home together.

Ingrid returned to Stockholm, and a few days later my mother traveled down. She also visited Linda and was shocked by the place she was in. She said it had been like that in Norway in the sixties. The nurses had white uniforms, she couldn't believe her eyes when she saw that, Mom said. The rooms were run-down and, to a great extent, institutional. Linda's enthrallment couldn't last that much longer, I suspected, because she was becoming more and more tired, and at some point she would collapse with exhaustion and plummet into what she was fleeing.

One morning the real estate agent called, she was angry, I could hear. The key had gone, she hadn't been able to get in, she had been forced to turn people away and tell them there was no viewing. We had agreed that we'd leave the key in a flowerpot, hadn't we? I said I didn't know what had happened, but I would investigate and contact her later.

I called Linda.

"You haven't been to the cabin, have you?"

"No," she said. "But I might've done something a little stupid."

"Oh?"

"Well, I told a man here about our place. I told him the cabin was empty and that the key was in a flowerpot beside the front step. He needed somewhere to live, you see. I just wanted to help him."

"What sort of a man?" I said.

"He's been here in the ward a few times. He was going to be deported, I think, and needed somewhere to hide."

"What!" I said.

"He was nice," she said.

"What sort of a person is he?"

"He's from Bosnia or Serbia or somewhere like that," she said. "He was in the war there."

"You know we're trying to sell the cabin, don't you?" I said. "There was a viewing organized and the key had disappeared. Thank God he wasn't there. But now we need to get hold of the key. You'll have to go and get it from him."

"But I can't do that," she said. "He might be a bit dangerous."

"Dangerous?"

"Yes."

"Take a nurse with you then. Tell them. Take two nurses. Can you do that?"

"Yes," she said.

Next time I went I talked to the nurse who had read Mein Kampf. He had gone to the cabin together with another nurse and Linda. The man had turned aggressive and refused to hand over the key, he was going to live there, she'd promised him. They managed to wrest the key from him, but his actions were so threatening afterwards that the nurses called for the police. I phoned the real estate agent and tried to explain what had happened. I said there had been a kind of break-in and a man had been living there. The place was probably a mess, but I would go and clean it up, and then we could make a fresh start. The real estate agent accepted that, but not without some skepticism in her voice.

Then Linda came home.

First she phoned late at night, she was absolutely hysterical, she hadn't been given any food, she'd smashed a glass in her fury, extra staff had been called, it was humiliating, now she wanted to come home. She had gone there of her own accord, it was her right, and half an hour later she was home. She was perfectly calm, and said it was enough now, she wanted to be at home. I said that was what I wanted as well. We talked for several hours, she was as she had been before, everything was good. The next morning she was on a high and restless again, and walked back to the hospital, but nevertheless something had happened, she was closer to herself, the energy was slowly draining from her, and one evening one of the nurses there, the motherly one, knelt in front of Linda and told her she had to go back to her husband and children, this had gone on for long enough and wasn't leading anywhere. The intensity of her plea had shocked Linda, shaken her, at the same time she was on her way down, she had begun to talk at a normal speed about normal things, to tell us she longed to be with us, and then one morning she came home with her backpack, and it was over.

It was over.

She embraced her children when they came back from school and said she was staying.

"Can you sleep now?" Vanja said.

"Yes," she said. "Now I can sleep."

We stayed up chatting that evening. She was worn out, quiet, but when she looked at me, it was Linda looking at me, no one else.

"I've been on a long journey," she said.

"Yes," I said.

"Now I'm home," she said.

"Yes," I said. "But it was no big deal."

"OK," she said. "I think I called your editor. Geir Gulliksen. I told him not to put you under any pressure. And to take care of you."

"That was nicely put," I said. "Not a problem."

"And I've called Tore. And Yngve. And all my old friends. People I haven't seen for years. I don't remember what I said."

"Not a problem. And now we know where we stand. Perhaps it will happen again. It might. But we know it's not a problem. You're just on your travels."

"Away from my family."

"No. You haven't been. It's been fine. You're a hero. You coped so well."

She cried.

I cried.

It was over.

But the cabin was a problem. I had to go and deal with it. Linda didn't want me to go, the guy was dangerous, the police had said we shouldn't confront him under any circumstances if we met him. I e-mailed Aage, one of the few friends I had in Malmö, explained the situation, and asked if he would be willing to accompany me with a baseball bat or something. He called me minutes later. He was in London. He said he could go with me when he was back and I shouldn't go on my own. I said I wouldn't. But a crazed ex-Yugoslav seemed like a minor problem after the summer I'd had, so I went to Åhléns and bought some new rugs, curtains, tablecloths and cushion covers, and some flowers from a florist, detergents and cloths from Hemköp, took the bus to the cabins, which were deserted in the rain, the season was already long over. My heart was thudding in my chest as I approached our cabin. I carefully opened the wicket gate, stopped, listened. Nothing. I walked around the back. Nothing. And the door was in one piece. He wasn't here. I unlocked the door and entered. It was a mess. It stank of smoke, and there were cigarette butts everywhere. The floor was filthy. There were bottles all over the place. But nothing was broken. I threw out all the rugs, curtains, tablecloths and cushion covers, all the bottles and cigarette butts and detritus. I was on my guard the whole time, expecting the door to be kicked in at any moment and the crazed guy to come in and gun me down. It didn't happen. I washed every single centimeter, from the ceiling over the cramped mezzanine to the floor. In several places there were fairly large piles of fine sawdust. I sighed. That had to be woodworm, the whole damned house must have been rotten to the core. I decided not to say a word. I laid the new rugs on the floor, hung the new curtains over the windows, put a cloth on the table and arranged the flowerpots. The cabin looked flawless. With a garbage bag in each hand I left, the rain was pouring down and dusk had started to fall. Not a soul in sight anywhere. I threw the bags into a trash container and caught the bus home. I had a hot bath and then watched a film with everyone – Dumbo, the elephant with the big ears. Linda was tired but collected and present.

The viewing was held: no offers. At the next viewing someone saw the triangular piles of fine sawdust, so new ones had appeared and people had shaken their heads, I assumed. We got Anticimex in, a pest-control company, it wasn't woodworm but some relatively harmless insect, they said, which they now had under control.

The real estate agent took the cabin off the market and put it back in spring, at the first viewing there was an offer, it was low, but we accepted it, money was no longer of any consequence in this dream. From October that autumn we spent every weekend in the new house. We celebrated Christmas there, all twelve of us, the snow was meters high outside, Vanja and Heidi saw me put on a Christmas elf outfit, but were still spellbound when I came across the snow with a lantern in my hand. After Christmas I ditched the manuscript and started anew with this one. I got up at four every morning and worked until the children had to be picked up, and I have been doing that until now, as I sit here writing this. The story of last summer that I have just told looks different now, I know, from the way it really was. Why? Because Linda is a human being and her unique essence is indescribable, her own distinctive presence, her nature and her soul, which were always there beside me, which I saw and felt regardless of whatever else was going on. It didn't reside in what she did, it didn't reside in what she said, it resided in what she was.

It resides in what she is. Leaning over Heidi, whispering something in her ear, Heidi laughing her trilled laugh. Lying on the sofa with Vanja on top, laughing at something our clever daughter has said. The tenderness in her gaze as she looks at John. And her hand at the base of my neck, warm, those totally unguarded eyes of hers.

I am so happy about Linda, and I am so happy about our children. I will never forgive myself for what I've exposed them to, but I did it, and I will have to live with it.

Now it is 7:07, and the novel is finally finished. In two hours Linda will be coming here, I will hug her and tell her I've finished, and I will never do anything like this to her and our children again. Then we'll take the train to Louisiana. I am going to be interviewed onstage, after which it will be her turn, because her own book has come out and it glitters and sparkles like a star-filled night sky. Afterwards we will catch the train to Malmö, where we will get in the car and drive back to our house, and the whole way I will revel in, truly revel in, the thought that I am no longer a writer.

Malmö, Glemmingebro, February 27, 2008–September 2, 2011

To Linda, Vanja, Heidi, and John.
I love you.

Karl Ove Knausgaard was born in Norway in 1968. His debut novel Out of the World won the Norwegian Critics Prize in 2004 and his A Time for Everything was a finalist for the Nordic Council Prize. My Struggle is a New York Times Best Seller and has been translated into more than twenty languages. Knausgaard writes regularly for The New York Times Magazine. In 2010, he co-founded the independent publishing house Pelikanen, based in Stavanger.

Don Bartlett has translated novels by many Danish and Norwegian authors, among them Jo Nesbø, Roy Jacobsen, Lars Saabye Christensen, Per Petterson, and Gunnar Staalesen. He lives with his family in Norfolk, England.

Martin Aitken is the translator of numerous novels from Danish and, most recently, Norwegian, including works by Peter Høeg, Helle Helle, Kim Leine, Hanne Ørstavik, and Ida Jessen. He lives and works in Denmark.

Perhaps the most significant literary enterprise of our time.

Rachel Cusk, The Guardian

Many writers strive to give you the effect, the illusion, of reality. Knausgaard seems to want to give his readers the reality of reality—to strip away the literary tricks, to burst through language, to explode the artifice. And he achieves this... Knausgaard is honest and wise, and it is only after you are a few hundred pages into My Struggle that you realize how rare these properties are in contemporary writing... The book sears the reader because Knausgaard is a passionate idealist and not just a tetchy complainer. He wants to create great art, and he wants to fight the conformity and homogeneity of modern bourgeois existence.

James Wood, The New Yorker

What's notable is Karl Ove's ability, rare these days, to be fully present in and mindful of his own existence. Every detail is put down without apparent vanity or decoration, as if the writing and the living are happening simultaneously. There shouldn't be anything remarkable about any of it except for the fact that it immerses you totally. You live his life with him.

Zadie Smith, The New York Review of Books

How wonderful it is to read an experimental novel that fires every nerve ending while summoning in the reader the sheer sense of how amazing it is to be alive, on this planet and no other.

Jeffrey Eugenides, The New York Times Book Review

The novel imagines a kind of ultimate freedom – a spiritual freedom based in radical openness. It's expansive and impersonal, yet still human; it's concrete, anti-ideological, and, above all, emotional. Beyond, alongside, or perhaps within the quest to know oneself, there's a quest to know the universe.
